
George Christensen, the vice president for academic affairs at Iowa State University, is the chairman of the team doing the review.

"Everything is going well," Christenson said. "Everyone has been very cooperative and informative that the team has interviewed," he said. However, he refused to discuss the results because the members of the team have not gotten together to discuss them yet.

The accreditation committee has been on campus since Sunday, and met with Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey to discuss procedures. The have been meeting with members of the University to also determine how the school has improved since the last evaluation in 1979.

A progress report was issued by the University in September that described the changes made over the past five years. The changes include the establishment of an Executive Vice Chancellor, the creation of the Office of the Vice Chancellor for University Relations and Development, the Vice Chancellor of research and the Office of Institutional Research and Planning.

The report also says that minority enrollment at UMass has increased from 5.4 percent in 1980 to 7.9 percent in 1983.

The Tower Library was designated as a problem in the report, which is described as "consistently funded at a substantially lower rate than libraries at comparable institutions." The report also cited that computer capabilities have been strained beyond capacity in recent years.

In its first accreditation, the University was called "one of the country's major universities in size and distinction." The final report, which will be issued later this year, will identify the progress the University has made, and any areas that may need further work.

Mass. facing pre-natal crisis

By MARIANE MEUSE
Collegian Correspondent

A current crisis involving pre-natal care for low-income women in Western Massachnusetts must be addressed immediately, according to a group of local doctors.

The Western Massachusetts Obstetricians and Gynecologists Association has requested the Massachusetts Attorney General's Office to examine the state's Medicaid system, which they say is the cause of this public health emergency.

The Medicaid program, jointly funded by the state and federal governments, provides medical aid to people who fall below a certain income level.

The situation "puts patients in a bind," Elana Wolfe, director of health education at the University of Massachusetts said. "They cannot afford pre-natal care without Medicaid."

In a letter addressed to Attorney General Francis X. Belotti, the Association claimed that many women are being denied pre-natal care until their sixth month of pregnancy. They attribute this to various problems within the Medicaid system.

Wolfe said it is "Extremely important that the women are seen early in thier pregnancy." Delayed care may lead to high infant-mortality rates, according to the letter.

The Boston Globe stated that the ratio or obstetricians to Medicaid recipients in Holyoke is one to 2356.

Whitmore promoting United Way

University of Massachusetts' administrators are trying to encourage UMass employees to make personal donations to the United Way.

Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey, Provost Richard O'Brien, John L. DeNyse, vice chancellor of administration and finance, Dennis Madson, vice chancellor of student affairs, and Deirdre Ling, vice chancellor or university relations and development, all made personal contributions that will go to non-profit organizations through the United Way. Madson said that the goal of the campaign is not only to raise $50,000, but to "get a higher percentage of university employees involved" in the drive.

Robert White, who represents the United Way campaign at UMass, said UMass participation is "unique" in the campaign this year, because employees who live in counties other than Hampshire, can designate which county will receive their contribution. Employees can also specify which of the organizations will receive their money, White said.

"In the past," White said, "we have been disappointed in UMass compared to sister organizations."

Last year, Amherst College and Smith College had a donation percentage of about 50 percent, while UMass had 13 percent participation rate he said. The participation rate is the percentage of university employees who contribute.

Note service questioned

By RONDA APPLEBAUM
Collegian Staff

Some University of Massachusetts professors are questioning the use of the Student Notes and Printing Service because its purpose is not clear, according to Linda Irwin, manager of SNPS.

"Many professors feel that the sales of the notes of their lectures is unethical. They think that SNPS sells notes with the intent of assisting students who don't want to go to class," Irwin said.

"The notes are intended to be a supplement to the students own class notes and regular attendance of classes," she said. The notes also serve as an aid to students who have missed class due to illness.

Sheldon Cashden, Psychology professor, said that he doesn't allow SNPS to offer notes from his lectures because, "some semesters the note taking was excellent but sometimes there were many inaccuracies" with the transcripts. Cashden said many students substitute the notes from SNPS for class attendance.

"I feel that class attendance is important," he said.

Fergus Clydesdale, a professor of food science and nutrition, said that SNPS provides a good service.

"The key is precision and accuracy on note taking, and I think that at times the note-takers are not accurate. They should be because the notes are rather expensive," said Clydesdale. But Clydesdale also said that students shouldn't complain about inaccuracies because they should use it as a supplement and not a primary source.

Jennifer Clapp, senior HRTA major said she uses the notes, "because sometimes I'm sick and I have to miss the class, or because one of my classes conflicts with another."

Chris Gallucci, sophomore engineering major said, "I use the notes as a supplement, but I still go to class."

"We never sell lecture notes without the professors' explicit permission," said Irwin. "Some professors even supply their own notes," she said.

Irwin said students don't understand the purpose of SNPS. "If the students abuse the system and do poorly, it will be their fault, not SNPS."

Dennis Madsen, vice chancellor of student affairs, said of SNPS, "Clearly it's been an aid to many students. It's been helpful in terms of supplementing their whole classroom experience."

Guitar stolen from DC stereo taken from room

An AM-FM stereo, valued at $208, was stolen from a locked room on the first-floor of MacNamara dormitory sometime Tuesday, UMass police said.

A Yamaha guitar, valued at $180, was reported stolen at 1:49 p.m. yesterday from Worcester Dining Commons. The guitar was placed on the floor near the owner and stolen during a 15 minute period.

A jacket, valued at $50, and a wallet containing $55 in cash, were stolen from Holdsworth Hall. Police reported that the owner left the jacket and wallet in the room and returned an hour later to find it missing.

Dugal said he had met Gandhi several times while working in the Indian government and that, "She represented in India the sort of perserverence and grit which my people have." In her political dealings, "She was very authoritative," he said. "I personally feel my country needs that because it is so large," he said. "Personally, I was a great admirer of hers. She was very warm and humane." Dugal said, hhere are about 120 Indians in the Amherst area, most of them graduate students.

Rajiv Gandhi, the son of Indira Gandhi, was sworn in yesterday as the new leader of the Indian government. This prevented a break in the Gandhi dynasty that has led the country since their independence. Local Indian reaction regarding his ability to lead the country has been negative.

"He is inexperienced," said Rema Pai. "His political career has been short and he is weak in the area of foreign policy."

Indur Mandhayan, a graduate student, thought that the killing must have been personally motivated. "The elections are only on the 23rd of January," he said. "If the Sikhs wanted to change the situation, they could have done it politically. They didn't have to resort to violent means."

Most members of the Indian community, though they may not have agreed with Mrs. Gandhi's politics, respected her as a strong leader. As Amala Reddy said, "She was an institution, I can't believe she's really dead."

Angry mobs set fire to a train in Calcutta Wednesday soon after the news of Indira Gandhi's assassination reached the city. All offices, educational institutions and shops closed, and movement of all transports halted as the news spread in the city.

Indira Gandhi, daughter of India's first prime minister, Jawaharlal Nehru, dominated the political life of this teeming nation for two decades. She turned India into a nuclear power and strengthened its role as a Third World leader, but her governments made little progress in relieving India's deep poverty, or in overcoming its internal religious and ethnic conflicts.

"Our beloved Mrs. Indira Gandhi is no longer with us," a grieving President Singh, himself a Sikh, siad in a nationwide televised address Wednesday night.

".... Let us demonstrate to the world that India's stability cannot be jeopardized by a handful of sub-human assassins."

The funeral and cremation were scheduled for Saturday. Until then, her body will lie in state at her late father's home. The armed forces were put on alert and a 12-day period of national mourning was declared.

The Indian leader was shot at 9:20 a.m. 10:50 p.m. EST Tuesday as she emerged from her home on a tree-lined New Delhi avenue for a recorded interview with British actor Peter Ustinov.

"Suddenly ... two persons carrying Sten submachine guns one uniformed and one in civilian clothes - shot at Mrs. Gandhi," the news agency United News of India later reported.

One of the Sikh security men fired from just seven feet away, it said, and the prime minister, clad in an orange cotton sari, fell with a cry. Between eight and 16 bullets struck her in the chest, abdomen and thigh, various reports said.

The Ustinov camera crew was waiting in the Gandhi garden, about 80 yards away, and heard but did not see the attack, which they said occurred at the residence's gate.

"We heard three single shots followed by machine-gun fire.... Then 20 seconds later there was another burst of machine-gun fire," said cameraman Rory O'Farrell.

Early reports varied on the number of assassins and what happened to them.

Womencenters open

The Northeast and Orchard Hill women's are kicking off their re-opening with an open house this Thursday evening.

Both centers have been closed since last May, and according to Lynn Wilson, the new Sexism Awareness Programmer, the centers opening now will have a broader focus designed to attract a more diverse group of women.

"The women's centers had gotten to be the voice of one group of women. They now have a new role: women's coalition centers, spaces where individuals and groups with different experiences and needs can work together and get to know what each other's interests and resources are." Wilson said.

The centers' new coordinators, Heather Levi and Colette Rausch, said they will have a better idea of the center's direction and plans after the open house. All women are welcome to attend.

Failed policy merits scorn

"There's blood in peacetime," a letter by David Julian Abram in the October 30 Collegian, implies that to condemn the policies that cost the lives of 241 Marines in Beirut is to denigrate the memory of these men. George Bush attempted to make the same point against Geraldine Ferraro in the Vice Presidential debate. Neither man realizes that it is fully consistant to feel the deepest respect for those Marines, their sense of duty and their sacrifice, while feeling utter contempt for the ignorance that led to their deaths and nothing else. Those who hold that the Reagan Administration's policies in Lebanon did not fail, that something besides tragedy came from the Marines' mission, must explain why a government of national unity was formed promptly after our military withdrawal from Lebanon.

Either sex can be raped

Rape is a physical act of degradation that is inflictable by a member of either sex, upon a member of either sex. In response to Tracey Boisseau's October 25 column, I do not condone the "Ditch the Bitch" crowd, and I cannot condone the woman's assault on the man. When talking about the other sex in public and in private, both sexes can be degrading. In her column, she says, "I say I struck him in self-defense," yet she makes no mention of the man physically attempting to attack her. This is assault. If he had struck her after she spit at him, would the authorities haul him in for assault and battery and attempted rape?

Why is it that only men are targeted, in a sweeping generalization, as rapists and women protrayed only as rape victims? Certainly there is such a thing as a man being raped, which, I imagine, also degrades the victim. If an undesired sexual act is only one of the ways rape occurs, then she "rapes" him by the same definition that he "rapes" her. His acts, while not laudable by any decent standard, constitute a verbal degration. The result of her inability to speak, her act of spitting constitutes a physical degradation.

How could she be certain he had raped one or more people? What should be asked in the same question is: How many people has she raped? She portrays men as another class. Are men "The Second Class"?

Boisseau in her closing statements, sets forth that she must suffer from this "fatal flaw of rapeability" and that we are a society of rapists and rape victims. I do not approve of rape under any circumstances, so I must ask: If both men and women, society as a whole can be raped, then who is left as the rapists?

Can't UMass take a joke?

As publishers of parodies and other specialty magazines, my partner, Gerald L. Taylor (previously the publisher of The National Lampoon for seven years, as well as publisher of Harper's Bazaar for several years), and myself subscribe to a clipping service which enables us to measure the media attention given to our magazines. We were therefore able to read with horrified, albeit fascinated, interest of the dialogue currently between the bookstore, the college administration, and various student special interest groups concerning our magazine Cosmoparody.

Assuming that we have properly understood your reporting on the matter, it appears that some people were unhappy because our magazine was thrown off the newsstand because of poor sales. They feel it should have been thrown off the newsstands because it was idealogically unsound. Such a tactic would have given them greater peace of mind since it would have granted them an a priori certainty that there wouldn't have been any sales at all.

Two elements of this matter trouble me. I am saddened that supposedly intelligent, literate people have placed ideological filters of sufficient strength on their brains so that they seriously misinterpret both meaning and intent. I am outraged and frightened that there would be an attempt to censor in the midst of a bastion of academic freedom.

Cosmoparody is a parody of Cosmopolitan Magazine. We see Cosmopolitan as the most sexist of all magazines. Our intent, and from the mail response we have received from delighted readers it appears to us that we have succeeded, was to reveal the magazine for what it actually is in a humorous, and occasionally outrageously humorous, manner. The article "How To Seduce Your Rapist" was intended as the ultimate Cosmopolitan service article—inane, silly, sexist, and out of step with today's women. Everyone else got the joke. What happened at the University of Massachusetts?

Team names must change

I find it difficult to believe that a newspaper such as the Collegian which prides itself on its awareness of women's issues still allows the word "minutemen" to be used or women's sports teams.Granted,"minutemen" leaves much to be desired as a word and as a concept, but really!

Calling women athletes minutemen is just as sexist as calling a woman a chairman, fireman, or policeman. These words are reflections of a patriarchal society in which men are the norm and women, especially women who hold the jobs described by these words, are deviants.

The Collegian has shown continuing commitment to its women's news desk and the Board of Editors has instituted a policy against sexist advertising. It's time the sports page caught up with the rest of the paper.

Reagan and the New Right: what didn't get mentioned

Andrew M. Paven

President Reagan addressed a congregation at Temple Hillel in North Woodmere, Long Island, Friday, to whom yarmulkes complete with the Presidential seal, were handed out like so many campaign buttons.

He told the congregation that the Republican Party at their convention in Dallas this summer, passed a resolution condemning anti-Semitism, while the Democrats "couldn't find the moral leadership or courage to pass a similar resolution" at their convention.

Reagan didn't tell the congregation that the GOP convention opened with a prayer of thanksgiving by the Rev. James Robison, an evangelical preacher who hosts a syndicated television show, who has also been quoted as saying: an anti-Semite "is someone who hates Jews more than he's supposed to." And, "The non-Christian can't understand spiritual things."

Nor did Reagan tell them that the Rev. Robison is someone with whom he has met frequently over the past four years.

Robison's prominence at the GOP convention was not accidental. The script for the convention was approved by the White House,the Reagan-Bush Committee, and the Republican National Committee. "Robison's elevation to the honored party pulpit was a testament to the rise of the new Evangelical Right," writes political reporter Sydney Blumenthal in The New Republic, Oct. 22.

Robison is in the forefront of the far right of the Republican Party that wants to make the non-economic "social issue"—e.g., school prayer and abortion—the dominant theme of the party—to force their moral views on the country, to make this nation as they imagine it should be, a "Christian nation."

Other leaders of the evangelical New Right at the GOP convention included the Rev. W.A. Criswell, and the Rev. Jerry Falwell.

Criswell, pastor of the First Baptist Church in Dallas, campaigned fervently against John F. Kennedy in 1960: Kennedy's election would "spell the death of a free church in a free state." He wrote and circulated pamphlets, one of which was titled, "Can a Man Be a Loyal Roman Catholic and a Good President of the United States?" His answer: No.

It was at a prayer breakfast hosted by Criswell on the last day of the convention, that Reagan declared religion and politics "inseparable."

Falwell, a prominent leader of the evangelical New Right, began his rise to fame when as an unknown pastor in Lynchburg, Va., in 1978, he was introduced by a man named Ed McAteer to a man named Howard Phillips.

McAteer, a former sales marketing manager for Colgate-Palmolive, left Palmolive to join the Christian Freedom Foundation, an organization begun in 1950 with the goal of electing "real Christians" to political office. The C.F.F. company published One Nation Under God, which first laid out the notion of America as a "Christian Republic" based on "Christian principles."

In 1976 McAteer left the C.F.F. to work for the Conservative Caucus, run by Richard Viguerie. Viguerie had taken the list of George Wallace's contributors and through direct-mailing turned it into a populist movement based mostly on single issue caucuses.

McAteer introduced Howard Phillips, Viguerie's right hand man, to Falwell. Phillips proposed that Falwell head a new movement, for which Phillips already had a name: The Moral Majority. Writes Blumenthal, at first, "There was skepticism from (Falwell's) people that there wasn't enough money,' says Phillips. At the next meeting, Falwell was converted."

Falwell's rise to prominence in this country was thus no more happenstance than was Robison's prominence at the GOP convention. The New Right has a well orchestrated campaign.

Reagan's administration has treated the New Right with what Blumenthal describes as "repressive tolerance"—i.e., the administration has encouraged the Right, but it has not lent solid legislative support to the cause.

But when Reagan's gone, Falwell, Criswell, Robison, Viguerie, et al., will still be around. As Reagan says, "You ain't seen nothin' yet."

A vote for the Republican Party this year is as much a vote for these men and their groups, as it is a vote for Ronald Reagan.

The President didn't tell that to the congregation at Temple Hillel.

Andrew M. Paven is a Collegian columnist.

Waiting for a dream

Diane Lane

With the election just days away, no one can say we have not had our glimpse of the future, as seen through the slogans of Walter Mondale and Ronald Reagan. Men of Peace; Bread not Bombs...why then, don't I feel comforted? In many ways I feel as though this campaign has been waged over my head, in a mushroom cloud of tough talk about warheads and missiles and armageddon. I am not comfortable with the rhetoric of war, or the fighting of it; yet everything about this election seems to have degenerated into some kind of manhood issue. For a while there I thought maybe I had stumbled, accidentally, into an all-male weight lifting club, what with all the talk of arm-wrestling and ass-kicking.

It is interesting that Geraldine Ferraro's presence in the campaign has caused such a macho ruckus. She was supposed to herald a new era of women's rights—instead she has pointed out the quite massive gap that still exists between perceptions of us and them. And while I have always tried to maintain a healthy perspective between my own beliefs and those of radical feminist groups, the things I have witnessed in the last few weeks of this campaign have, literally, turned my stomach.

Male students made crude sexual jokes about Ferraro, elderly grandmothers display an astonishing, almost personal hatred of her and there has been a putrid parade of anti-choicers who dare to tell me about my body. Woman's freedom should not be a topic for debate.

The structure of democracy has grown immense and clumsy, trampling on the backs of those who have believed in her. We insist on chaining ourselves with the freedom we desire. America hurries, inordinately, towards her destiny and I cannot catch up to warn her, so discouraged have I become at the turn of things.

There is an alarming wave of intolerance sweeping through this country; the crest of which will wash Mr. Reagan and his party of elitism into four more years of office. I feel I may be drowning in that wave. Major newspapers are refusing to carry anti-Reagan political cartoons such as Doonesbury and Bloom County; Feelings of anti-unionism run rampant. Radical religion threatens to force its way into my life.

The mandate Mr. Reagan will claim on November 7 will be, at most, 30 percent of the eligible voters. Many people will stay at home, through apathy or ignorance. I am frightened and uneasy at the thought of another Reagan term. I am afraid for the democracy the constitution promises me and for the dreams my father promised me. Reagan's vision is not mine.

In the 1800s Thomas Wolfe wrote, "I think the true discovery of America is before us...I think the true fulfillment of our spirit, of our people...is yet to come. The true discovery of our own Democracy is still before us." And we are still waiting, my friends and I. We are women and men, we are white and Black, we are Indians and hispanics—indeed, we are multi-colored and we are still waiting.

I had a dream the other night that I was with John Kennedy when he was shot, and in agonizing slow motion, I ran to help him. It was a strange dream, made all the more so because I was only two years old when he died and cannot claim to have known him. They say he had "vision" though, and perhaps it is that for which I reach out in my restless sleep.

Random notes

The battle neither men nor women won

Now it seems like a long time ago; I remember it vaguely, even though it scared the hell out of me. But the fact remains that I was mugged in Jamaica Plain only two years and four months ago.

I can remember lying in bed during the first few nights afterward. The night that it happened, I could not sleep until the daytime. The first night that I had used a light, I still could not get to sleep for seven hours. Then when I could sleep with no light except that which came through my window from the street, I would lie in bed and congratulate myself for having taken it. I had not been hit for a long time, but I had taken it.

Whenever you congratulate yourself for enduring something, though, you have to recall to yourself what you had endured. And that can be scary in a dark room.

For about four months I was scared of my own community. Four months of looking over my shoulder and taking more than the usual precautions. One morning while I was waiting for the Arborway to Boston, I thought that those two boys had come and torn something away from me. They had decided to make me helpless and afraid, all for a couple of dollars, a jacket and a pair of glasses. For 15 minutes I had absolutely no control over my own life. My life was in the hands of two boys, who, I believe, didn't care if I lived or died.

In short, I had been violated.

Last week, a woman said that she had been raped by the presence of the "Ditch the Bitch" sign displayed at the Ferraro rally. The sign does violate women. so, by legitimate association, the presence of the sign raped women.

The banner was humiliating. It showed that women will not, for some time, escape the attempts at their own degradation, no matter how much good they try to do.

But I would like to know if the woman felt clear and content after hitting and spitting on the men who displayed the "Ditch the Bitch" sign.

Did you feel that you had accomplished something? Or had you just helped to deepen the alienation between men and women, which ultimately causes rape?

Did you feel that you were being active while the other women at the rally were being apathetic? Were you really of such a higher knowledge to realize that hitting and spitting were the only effective and necessary measures available?

Or were you just angry, like the men, and therefore unable to control yourselves, like the men?

No one was right or wrong at that rally sign. In the end, all that was left were the two sexes continuing their battle.

Twisted Beauty

By HERB RAMY & MATT MACHERA
Collegian Correspondents

A camera pans across what appears to be an old cemetary. Suddenly, the camera focuses on a vampire who bears a stricking resemblance to Billy Idol. Is this the opening to another low-budget horror? No, It's the opening to another high budget Brian DePalma film. The lights go up on what we learn is a Hollywood sound stage. The entire scene has been an elaborate illusion set up by DePalma to introduce the main character. This character is Jake, a struggling claustrophobic actor played by Craig Wasson.

Jake's claustrophobia causes him to lose his job because he can't stand to be in the vampire's coffin. That same day he drives home to find his girlfriend in bed with another man. Later he meets another struggling actor who is housesitting for a friend. This new acquaintance asks Jake if he will move in and keep an eye one the place while he is out of town on a five week acting job. The most important feature of this spaceship-like house is a telescope pointing at the bedroom of a beautiful young woman. To say any more wouldn't be fair to you. Suffice it to say that from here Jake becomes involved in a twisted plot of sex and murder.

In his past works, DePalma has always borrowed bits and pieces from Hitchcock movies, and Body Double is no exception. Only this time he seems to steal directly from these old classics. To a person who has seen some of Hitchcocks pictures these thefts are obvious. Why then does DePalma do it? Body Double is a satiric look at the Hollywood film industry. Obviously stolen scenes are placed there to add to this theme, and these make the movie.

It is unfortunate that these same scenes are also Body Double's major flaws. Unless the viewer has seen Hitchcock's Rear Window and Vertigo the impact of this film may be lost. There are other satiric moments in the picture, but unless the major ones come through the others fall short.

For the Hitchcock fan this movie is quite entertaining. It provides a suspenseful thriller with touches of comedy and eroticism. For the average movie-goer, though, Body Double might be a bit hard to understand.

Arts

Art and pretense

By CHARLES FRANCIS CARROLL
Collegian Staff

After studying the photographs in this exhibit and also attending the panel discussion about them, it is my conclusion that this experimental presentation of anthropological photography as art is for the most part a failure. I found the exhibit to be extremely pretentious in that is pretends to explore society and also pretends to have artistic value. This pretension is partly the fault of the curators, but may also reflect the pretensions of anthropology in general.

First, even though the show is a composite of very diverse elements and points of view, from 'Balinese villagers to MacDonalds' workers in Iowa, it lacks a real thematic continuity as well as a homogeneous presentation. Rather than explore society, the exhibit really explores whether or not snapshots by anthropologists can be called artful because their subject matter is interesting.

The photos are not artful overall, although undeniably several of the photographers are artists. Most notably in this genre is Peter Matthiesson, or else Bill Aron. There are aesthetic problems that the viewer cannot ignore: graininess, focus, contrast, balance, etc. Finally, without the accompanying text, the photos do not tell the story.

To merely put poor photographs in expensive mats and frames does not make them objet d'art. These photographs belong in textbooks or museums, certainly, but just as certainly not in art galleries. Fortunately the exhibits close this Saturday, November 3. I might add that the Herter installation is the best of the three.

Frank & band bring their weirdness to the FAC

By JACK BRESNAHAN
Collegian Staff

It's safe to say that everyone had a good time at the Frank Zappa concert in the FAC Sunday night. Not only was the music clear and precise, but we were able to witness Frank's bizarre sense of humor first-hand.

Before beginning the show, Frank said that he'd like to dedicate it to John Smothers (a member of his crew) and to find out who is spreading the rumour that John is g-a-y. Then he started into "Zoot Allures," an instrumental icebreaker in which Frank took the first of his many fine solos. He also introduced the band at the end of it (Ray White-guitar and vocals, Chad Wackerman-drums, Al Tunis-bass, Bobby Martin-keyboards, vocals, Alan Zabal-keyboards, sax, vocals, harmonica, and Ike Willis-guitar, vocals, and percussion). Next cam "In France," (...In France you'll smell like that cheese box for a couple of weeks) from their new album. The third song was "I Am The Slime," from the Overnight Sensation album, which had an ominous bass line throughout. "Smell that suitcase boy!" Frank made great use of the whammy bar on this one. They also did "Cocaine Decisions," a song of constant harmony, with Frank content to sit in a chair smoking during guitar and horn solos. But there was mention of a cheesey little atom bomb and suitcases again and I felt a definite pattern developing.

I was surprised to hear "WPLJ" (though it was a shortened version) from the Burnt Weenie Sandwich album. Frank made first use of his conductor's baton during "Goblin Girl," ("Halloween night-At the costume ball-She's a goblin girl-She can gobble it all") in the fine spirit of the season. Next came "Montana" and Easy Meat," sung by Ike Willis. Right before the encore came "Joes Garage," ("1234-let's see if we smell some more") and "Why Does it Hurt When I Pee," ("why does it hurt when I cheese").

Before the first encore song Frank clarified the cheese and suitcase phenomena. It seems that one Arthur Barrow in the crew got into an argument with John Smothers. It is possible that he started a rumour that John is g-a-y. So John inserted some bad smelling Danish breakfast cheese in Arthur's suitcase where it remained undetected for a whole day. Frank wasn't sure who spread the rumour but, "Whoever said it is destined for cheese in the suitcase. We'll vote later to see if John is g-a-y."

"Camarillo Brillo" was the first encore song, followed by "Muffin Man." "Cosmic Debris" was well received and contained some clever lyric on the theme such as, "What kind of cheesecake are we talking about here?" and "The price of beef has just gone up and your suitcase has just gone down."

Before the second encore Frank took a vote for John fromthe audience to see if he was g-a-y. Apparently the vote supported the rumour because Frank said, "Uh Oh! All the cheese in the world won't help you now John." With that they did their final song, "Illinois Enema Bandit," sung by Ray White and Frank, "...in which Smothers might say, Don't you eall me gay!"

Of Meyer, Marvin and Max

This time the bossman went too far. This time he not only crossed the players, but the brass too. This time when Ron Meyer made a decision, he upset the wrong people.

So now, Meyer is out, Raymond Berry is in, and Rod Rust, the man Meyer thought he could do without, is back. Pat Sullivan, Daddy Sullivan, and the rest of the Sullivan monopoly simply didn't take kindly to their coach axing a defensive coordinater, who they had done quite alot to get in the first place, without so much as letting them know first.

The Meyer firing can be looked at in two ways. First, that it is the worst possible time to fire a coach. The team, whether you care to believe this or not, really is in a playoff race, and more disruptions at this point could be fatal.

The second possibility is the opposite. Now that Meyer is gone, the disruptions may very likely be gone also. The players themselves are happy with the move and that could be all the matters. Unhappy players give less than is needed. Happy players often give more.

This writer leans towards the second possibility.

Mustafa was simply another talking punching bag. Marvin was only doing what Marvin knows what must be done. Destruct and Destroy. Mustafa played the fool to the hilt.

Not only did he come back for a second beating, but he predicted he would take away Marvin's crown, maybe even knock him out. Oh, what a silly person Hamsho is. Things like that only serve to make the Marvelous one furious. It makes the hungry dog rabid. You can almost picture the foam.

But thanks to a group of pretenders known as the World Boxing Council, Marvin took a worse beating. In all their infinite wisdom, they have taken away their share of his title for reasons still not comprehensive to human thinking.

The one scenario that no one has thought out yet is what the WBC is really doing to some poor slob down the line. If they really pull off this insane ploy, successfully steal Marvin's belt, and give it to someone else, you know who Marvin will want to fight next. He will want that belt again and the same hunger, only intensified, will be in this eyes.

It will be a very long, no, make that very short, night for some opponent.

Didn't you know that it would happen this way? Didn't you know that Ole Max would sit at home through the Celts dreaded training camp, and then make his return when the fun started? Well, Max is indeed home and the city of Boston has breathed a collective sigh of relief. So too, it seems, has Max. Word has it that the prodigal son signed for the same money that was offered a month ago. Chalk another one up for Red.

Could it be that Cedric and agent Ron Grinker got a little nervous when Gerald Henderson was shipped to the West Coast? The only place Max really wants to play is Boston. Atlanta wouldn't be horrible, but Portland or Seattle would.

Whatever the reason, the Rubberband Man is back in Green, and that's all that matters right now. The past is the past, and in the future holds more championships to be won. It is time for the quest to begin.

Ex-Hogsters grab title

Tough defense holds on, beats Sixpackers 23-18

By BRIAN FRATES
Collegian Correspondent

As the old football adage goes, "The team that lives by the pass dies by the pass." Such was the case Wednesday night, as the Ex-Hogsters defeated the Six-Packers 23-18 for the Men's Intramural Flag Football Championship.

In a game that saw both quarterbacks combine to put the ball in the air over fifty times, it was the ability of the Ex-Hogsters to mix their pass offense with a solid ground attack that led them victory.

"It really seemed as though they threw the ball a lot more than we did," Ex-Hogster captain Dan Teneczar said. "I felt we mixed up our plays more effectively, and that it had a lot to do with our victory."

The Six-Packers drew first blood, wasting little time in taking advantage of an Ex-Hogster turnover. On the first play of the second quarter, Jack Bloise rolled to his right and hit Jim Knopf in the end zone for a quick touchdown. The two point conversion failed, and the score stood at Six-Packers 6, Ex-Hogsters 0.

It did not take long for the Ex-Hogsters to strike back. Starting on their own twenty yard line, they put together a time consuming drive, climaxing when Economou called a reverse on second down which caught the opposition flat-footed. Mike Galvin romped into the endzone, and Sid Niang added the point after for a 7-6 Ex-Hogster advantage.

The lead did not last more than five minutes. With two and a half minutes left in the half, Bloise hit Salustri with a thirty yard scoring strike. The two point conversion again failed, and the Six-Packers were up 12-7, content to take their lead into the second half.

They would, but not until both teams had scored again. After a nineteen yard field goal from Niang, Bloise then hooked up with Mike Brennan with fifteen seconds left to the half to make the score 18-10.

Aided by three penalties, the Ex-Hogsters closed out the first half scoring with just seconds left, with Economou hitting Vinnie Burton on the run. A two point conversion failed, and the first half ended, Six-Packers 18, Ex-Hogsters 16.

The second half was anti-climatic as far as action went. About two minutes into the third quarter, the Ex-Hogsters scored on a Economou to Rich Manning touchdown pass. Niang booted the point after, and the Ex-Hogsters held a five point lead, they held throughout the second half.

Jack Bloise, however, put together one last drive. On fourth and goal, Bloise rolled to his right looking for Knopf. He fired what seemed to be a sure touchdown strike.

However, the Ex-Hogster defense came through again, as a defensive player was just able to get his hand on the pass to give the Ex-Hogsters the victory.

"We've been waiting for this for four years," Economou said. "A lot of us are seniors. Maybe the wait made us a little hungrier."

Latest polls

The University of Massachusetts field hockey team fell to fifth in the nation despite not losing.

The Minutemen, 13-3, defeated by BU yesterday and must defeat rival UConn on Saturday to move back into the top four and gain a home field advantage in the playoffs. UNH, who lost to UMass earlier this season, climbed to fourth after losing only 1-0 to powerful Old Dominion, the number one team.

The playoff-bound women's soccer team, 12-2-2, stayed at fourth in the country in the final poll. The volleyball team is fourth in the Northeast Division 2 poll. Men's soccer is fourth in New England.

Volleyball playoffs: up in the air

By ROGER CHAPMAN
Collegian Staff

If you think that Calculus 340 homework you've been doing for weeks is confusing, take a look at the playoff situation for the University of Massachusetts volleyball team.

Before last weekend's West Point torney, the Minutemen were ranked fifth in the Northeast region and faceing must win situation. But then number one Northeastern University lost three matches and fell to third in the region and Bryand College, who was ranked fourth and didn't compete in the tourney, fell to sixth. The spikers are now breathing a bit easier, because they are now fourth in the region with a 24-14 mark.

What does all of this mean?

Simply this: the top four teams from the combined Northeast and Mid-Atlantic regions make post-season play in the ECAC championships. Add in that New Haven University, who is now ranked number one in the Northeast, didn't apply for league status, and you have a very promising situation for the spikers.

"We're definitely in contention, especially since there is one spot open," said coach Elaine Sortino.

And if you think that's the whole deal, think again.

The spikers also have the small matter of a state championship to deal with at this weekend's MAIAW tournament at Eastern Nazerene University.

"We've been the bridesmaid for a couple of years," said Sortino. "We really want to get this one."

The three team tourney includes UMass, Eastern Nazerene and the University of Lowell

Sports Log

Tony Betros

Just a few thoughts...

We're more than halfway through the football season and we have quite a few interesting developments. The Dolphins are still undefeated and looking to better their 17-0 season in 1972. The rarity in which undefeated seasons occur makes it tough to see Miami repeat, but they have the personnel this year to do it...Dan Marino (who ironically wears number 13--not what you would call a rabbit's foot) is having a better year than a human should have a right to. The Dolphins already have a three game lead over the Pats and Jets and, get this, a nine game lead over the Bills. Why am I suddenly thinking about the presidential election?

Speaking of the Pats, they once again showed incredible poise in coming back to beat the Jets last Sunday. That marks at least the fourth come-from-behind victory they've had this season, something they just weren't able to do in previous years. It's still going to be an uphill struggle for the playoffs, though. They won't catch Miami and have to battle the likes of the Raiders and Broncos as well as the Jets for the wild card...New coach Raymond Berry has the players in a happier frame of mind. Tony Collins said that Berry earned more respect in a day than Ron Meyer did in three years. What the Sullivans should have done was to fire Meyer and hire Rodney Dangerfield. I mean, he has a song out and everything.

The Celtics hung up championship flag number 15 last night, and they have set out a quest for number 16. They have quite a road block this year in the 76ers. Two rookies, Leon Wood and Charles Barkley have given the Sixers the added depth they lacked last year. Boy, the Barkley is one big fellow--6'6", 280 pounds. Instead of wasting space with a fat joke, the next time you hear Joan Rivers talk about Liz Taylor, substitute Barkley's name... A big surprise this year could be the Washington Bullets. They have always had a solid front line, and adding Gus Williams to the back court sure can't hurt. They will also challenge Boston for the top...With Milwaukee trading away their team earlier this season, the Chicago Bulls may be surprise winners of the Central Division. The Bulls have probably the most exciting player in the NBA since Julius in Michael Jordan. The man's got more than a three foot vertical leap. To really put it in perspective, he can almost jump over the Whitmore red tape.

It's been another week of hockey and Edmonton is still without a loss. Miami is one thing, but if they go undefeated, that would be, as they say in Amherst, wicked...The Hartford Whalers are tied for first (I'd never thought I'd write that) in the Adams Division with the Canadiens with Quebec and Buffalo struggling to get out of the cellar. The Bruins, meanwhile, fact the arch-rival Nordiques tonight. Forget about Hagler-Hamsho, or even Friday the 13th; if you want to see blood, tune in.

No more need be said.

Reagan: 'You ain't seen nothing yet'

Mondale's tax plan is criticized; protesters shout 'four more days'

By RITA MURPHY
Collegian Staff

BOSTON—President Ronald Reagan told more than 20,000 cheering supporters "America's best days are yet to come" at a political rally here yesterday that was disrupted several times by nearly as many anti-administration protesters.

Reagan, who made the stop in Boston to bolster the U.S. Senate candidacy of Republican Ray Shamie in the Bay State, told the noontime crowd at City hall Plaza that since he took office four years ago, "America is back with a powerful renewed spirit."

"Four years ago, we began to navigate by certain fixed principles. It was a second American revolution. It has only just begun. But America is back," Reagan said. "And you ain't seen nothing yet."

Chants of "U.S.A." and "Four more years" interrupted the president more than a dozen times while a loud, boisterous throng of demonstrators just outside the roped-off plaza, estimated at 25,000 by police, jeered Reagan with shouts of "Four more days" and "Dump Reagan."

"You know there's an echo in here, isn't there?" Reagan asked the crowd. He went on to say that when he took office he cut taxes for everyone, not just a certain segment of America, and pointing to the crowd of protesters said, "There's one group here that if they keep yelling, I'm going to raise their taxes."

But the boos and chants continued, which prompted those inside the plaza to shout back: "Mondale is a wimp."

Reagan attacked Walter Mondale's record in the U.S. Senate, claiming the former vice president voted 16 times to increase taxes. Reagan said Mondale has "consistently supported legislation time after time which increases taxes for my constituents."

"Now doesn't that make you want to become one of his constituents?" Reagan asked the crowd.

Mondale's proposed tax hikes would cost every household in America "$1,890 a year," Reagan said.

"That's like having a second mortgage, a Mondale mortgage. His economic policy has two plans, one to raise your taxes, the second to raise them again. The American people don't want those taxes and he's not going to get them."

The Democratic tickets tax plan would bring the present administration's economic recovery plan "to a roaring stop," he said.

"If my opponent's campaign were a T.V. program, it would be 'Let's Make a Deal.' If his campaign were a Broadway show it would be 'Promises, Promises' and if it were a book you would have to read it back to front to get a happy ending.

"He sees an America in which every day is tax day, April 15. We see an America in which every day is Independence day, July 4th."

There was heavy security on hand for the rally. Everyone let into the plaza area had to first pass through a metal detector device and be searched by security officers.

Most of the 20,000 in the plaza area were Reagan supporters but a few Mondale supporters roamed the crowd carrying "KKK for Reagan", "Dump Ray-gun" signs.

Just before the president arrived, a fight broke out between two older women near the front of the crowd, one trying to position a Reagan/Shamie sign, the other a "Prevent Nuclear War, Vote Mondale" sign. Following several push and shoves between the two, the woman carrying the Reagan sign punched the other woman, knocking her to the ground.

Alumni warm up pep rally, bon fire

By DEBORAH ROSS
Collegian Staff

This year's Homecoming weekend, expected to attract 5,000 University of Massachusetts alumni, will warm up tonight with a bonfire and pep rally at the Campus Pond.

Other events this weekend include the homecoming football game, a parade, and a big band concert featuring the University Jazz Ensemble.

Eric Snoek, an assistant at the Alumni Affairs office, said, "This year's homecoming will be better attended than ever.

"Last year, we had torrential rain, which dampened things alot," he said, "but this year, we have the potential for a fantastic weekend."

All of this weekend's events will be open to students, faculty and staff, as well as alumni and their guests.

This year, the British students at UMass will join the homecoming celebration by lighting a unique Anglo-American 'Guy Fawkes' bonfire at 7 p.m. today at the Campus Pond.

Guy Fawkes attempted to blow up the British Parliament in 1607, but was arrested before the explosion took place. The anniversary of the intended demolition is celebrated in Britain by the burning of bonfires with effigies of 'Guy' and fireworks displays.

Students 'die' to protest nuclear war

Take part in national campus demonstration

By LAURA YEE
Collegian Staff

Members of the University of Massachusetts Peacemakers will "die" as part of today's protest on college campuses nationwide to demonstrate the belief that suicide is better than surviving a nuclear war.

According to Julie Fitzgerald, an organizer of the event, about 20 students will march to the beat of a drum from the Fine Arts Center dressed in "somber, funeral-like" clothing to the Student Union Building, play a recording of the Emergency Broadcast System, and on the cue of a siren, fall down and silently "die" at noon.

"The recording will announce that 'this is not a test' instead of the usual 'this is a test.'" Fitzgerald said. "A few people dressed in shroud garb will trace the bodies with chalk on the cement," she said.

A cyanide referendum passed recently by Brown University's student government, requests health services to stock cyanide pills for students to ingest in the "unfortunate circumstance that we would survive a nuclear war," Brown student David Waskow said.

The peacemaker "die in" is part of an effort on 17 campuses throughout the country to continue the cyanide issue.

Waskow helped organize the action two weeks ago at Brown "to raise a unified student voice on the issue that the arms race must stop, and that suicide is a better alternative than trying to live after a nuclear war," Waskow said in an interview yesterday.

The 17 universities participating in the rally calling for "the end of the arms race" include Lewis and Clark University in Oregon, Ohio State University, the University of North Carolina, Tufts University and Cornell University.

"The universities are demonstrating against nuclear war in different ways that fit their school's stand on it," Waskow said.

"This madness must stop." — New Indian Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi

World and National News

Assassinations: an aftermath, a plot uncovered

Indian Army ordered to shoot rioters on sight

NEW DELHI, India (AP)—Soldiers were ordered to shoot rioters on sight in six major Indian cities yesterday to stop lynchings, beatings and arson that have killed a reported 157 people in northern India since the assassination of Prime Minister Indira Gandhi.

Hindus were reported to have hanged Sikhs, beaten them to death, and burned their shops, cars and homes in revenge for the prime minister's death Wednesday at the hands of two of her Sikh bodyguards.

Sikhs number 13 million in the predominantly Hindu nation of 730 million people, whom the 66-year-old prime minister ruled for 15 of the last 18 years.

For the first time since India's independence from Britain in 1947, the army was called into the capital to help police maintain law and order. When roaming Hindu gangs defied a round-the-clock curfew declaration, authorities ordered the troops to shoot rioters on sight.

Black smoke from burning buildings, shops and cars billowed over the city of 6 million.

Rajiv Gandhi, 40, who was selected by leaders of the ruling Congress Party to succeed his mother, met with opposition leaders Thursday night and issued an appeal for peace saying: "This madness must stop."

More than half a million people stood in a two-mile-long line to view the flag-draped body of the slain leader at her childhood home, the Teen Murti House. Police used tear gas and bamboo staves to keep enraged crowds from running wild over the residence grounds, and some frenzied mourners chanted, "Blood for blood," and "Indira Gandhi is immortal."

Shoot-to-kill orders were also issued in five nothern cities: Indore in Madhya Pradesh state, Patna in Bihar state and Rae Bareilli, Kanpur and Dehra Dun in Uttar Pradesh State. Curfews were imposed in 30 cities.

A nine-mile procession of people wearing black badges and carrying pictures of Mrs. Gandhi drew 10,000 mourners in Calcutta, India's most populous city.

Cocaine was to finance Honduran death ploy

WASHINGTON (AP) — The FBI arrested eight people yesterday in what it called an alleged plot by exile businessmen to assassinate Honduran President Roberto Suazo and take over that Central American government.

FBI Director William H. Webster said the bureau learned of the alleged plot last July from a U.S. citizen and inserted an undercover FBI agent into the scheme as one of the triggermen.

Webster said the FBI had seized 760 pounds of cocaine Sunday at a remote airstrip in south Florida. The drugs, which Webster said are worth $10.3 million wholesale, were to be used to finance the overthrow, Webster said.

He said a Honduran general, Jose A. Bueso-Rosa, 47, who is the military attache posted to Honduran embassy in Santiago, Chile, was among those named in a criminal complaint filed in U.S. District Court in Miami.

Also charged in the complaint was Faiz J. Sikaffy, 49, a Honduran citizen and businessman who lost more than $7 million in Honduras when the government nationalized his cement business. Sikaffy now operates a seafood business in Florida and resides in Miami.

In addition, the complaint charged Gerard Latchinian, 46, a Honduran citizen who lives in Miami, and who was described by the FBI as an international arms dealer with business interests in Honduras.

Webster said the conspirators planned to have Suazo killed and to use the resulting civil unrest to take over the Honduran government between Oct. 15 and Nov. 15, 1984.

Webster said the FBI undercover agent way to be paid $300,000 for the assassination of Suazo, with $100,000 of that to be paid in advance.

Reagan sends food to Africa

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Reagan yesterday approved $45.1 million worth of food shipments to three drought-stricken African countries and also authorized the chartering of two cargo planes to help speed food supplies to drought victims in Ethiopia.

The approval of new food aid for Kenya, Mozambique and Mali raised the total of emergency U.S. food assistance for Africa to $131 million in the last month alone, compared with $173 million for the preceding 12 months.

On Tuesday, the White House accused Ethiopia of ignoring the needs of its estimated 6 million hungry shile spending lavish sums for a celebration in September commemorating the 10th anniversary of Marxist rule.

M. Peter McPherson, administrator of the Agency for International Development, told a news conference that since the anniversary, Ethiopia has focused "substantially more attention" on the hunger problem.

Reagan's announcement of new food deliveries was made by White House spokesman Larry Speakes while the president headed for a campaign appearance in Boston.

Speakes' announcement said Kenya will receive 120,000 metric tons of food worth $25.5 million, Mozambique 73,000 metric tons worth $12.7 million and Mali 1,500 metric tons worth $6.9 million.

Since Oct. 1, emergency food aid has been sent to 15 countries, Speakes said. Niger and Chad also are under active consideration for such assistance, he said.

Woman injected

RALEIGH, N.C. (AP) — Velma Barfield, rejected by court after court, dropped her appeals and awaited a 2 a.m. execution this morning for poisoning her boyfriend that would make her the first woman put to death in the United States since 1962.

Barfield, 52, told prison officials she would exchange her brown prison dress for her own pink cotton pajamas shortly before she was wheeled on a gurney into the death chamber to receive a lethal injection.

Barfield confessed to poisoning St. Pauls farmer Stuart Taylor, who died Feb. 3, 1978. She also confessed to poisoning her mother and two elderly Lumberton residents who employed her as a live-in housekeeper. She repeated the confession on the witness stand while testifying at her December 1978 trial.

She was never charged in the killings of her mother and two employers.

Duffey, others tour campus for dark areas

Administrators met with members of the student senate rape task force and toured the campus last night in an effort to determine the location of problem darkness areas at the University of Massachusetts.

Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Dennis L. Madson, Director of Public Safety Gerald O'Neill, and Physical Plant Director Roger Cherewatti met with student senators Stacy Roth, Greg Fink, Suzanne Gauger, Robert Griffin, Student Government Association President Rick Patrick, and Coordinator of the Women's Leadership Project Liisa Trocki.

"We are here to point out unlit places on campus that are lacking security measures such as lighting, call boxes and untended undergrowth," Fink said.

The group started out in a van at the Student Union Building and immediately found the dark area behind Thompson Hall on the trail down to "P" lot.

The students pointed out dark areas and lack of call boxes in "P" lot, lot 25, lot 44, and the rest of campus including sections of Orchard Hill, Central, Northeast, Sylvan, and Southwest to the administrators.

Director of Public Safety Gerald O'Neill said the action taken by the students "reaffirms what we are planning."

The only confrontational moment came over the suggestion proposed by the students that the trail through the orchard from Sylvan to Orchard Hill "be made more safe."

Duffey said he thought it would be better to discourage people from walking on the path at all. Cherewatti said the cost of putting lights and call boxes on the path would be very high.

Trocki from the WLP said, "Rape has a very high emotional cost in a woman's life."

Duffey stressed the need for more education and said his office was planning "ads in the paper, signs on paths and bulletins (regarding personal safety)."

The rape task force of the student senate was formed last week by Fink, Griffin, and Roth in response to one reported rape and other rapes that were rumoured to have happened on campus.

Machine burns in JFK

About 300 residents of John F. Kennedy dormitory in Southwest were evacuated last night after smoke was discovered in a 14th floor laundry room.

According to 14th floor resident assistant James Gilmartin, Kennedy residents spent about 15 minutes outside as fire department officials investigated.

Gilmartin said the cause of the smoke was a worn-out washing machine belt which had burned, but he did not know whether the fire alarm had been pulled or if the smoke had set it off.

The alarm went off about 8:41 p.m. Damage was reported at $70.

New vending rules proposed

By JOHN VINCENT
Collegian Staff

The Campus Center Board of Governors last night proposed to change vending rules so non-school related vendors in the Campus Center would be charged more and have to be monitored by the student groups that sponsor them.

The proposal will be voted on next week.

Most of the vendors who sell on the concourse are student related. Those who are not will be charged 20 percent of their sales if they make more than $300, if the proposal passes.

BOG chairperson Bob Abele said he expects the motion to pass and that it may be amended so that part of the fee goes to the Board of Governors.

The bulk of the fee would go to the Recognized Student Organization who sponsored the outside vendor. Presently the only fee the outside vendors pay is a daily rent of at least $60 to the RSO. Under the new policy, vendors making under $300 will only have to pay RSO rent.

Abele said that with the new fee system, RSOs will have to justify what the money will be used for before they are allowed to sponsor a vendor, so they do not just take the money and throw a party.

The vendors may also be asked to demonstrate that their product is "unique" to the student market.

The proposal also limits the vendors to a 10-day maximum contract; vendors now can get 20 days. No more than two outside vendors a day will be allowed on the Campus Center concourse. Vendor Coordinator Jim Thompson said this will help stop the concourse from looking like a flea market.

Pro-lifers are 'tied to right,' Catholic says

SOUTH HADLEY — Addressing the increasingly heated abortion debate between pro-choice Catholic politicians such as Geraldine Ferraro and conservative church officials, Professor Daniel Maguire of Catholics for a Free Choice spoke to a receptive audience of 80 last night at Mount Holyoke College.

"There is no evidence that illegality will mean fewer abortions, but it will mean the deaths of poor women," Maguire said.

He cited an obscure doctrine of the Catholic Church called "Probabalism," in which in cases of moral doubt one is free to follow one's conscience as theological justification for a pro-choice position.

"The Catholic tradition contains a lot of subtelty and ambiguity which unfortunately has been lost," he said.

Maguire said almost all moral theology on abortion "has been written by celibate men sitting behind desks." He cited a profound mistrust of women as one of the reasons for the furor surrounding the abortion issue.

Instead of condemning women who choose abortion, Maguire urged people to think about the reasons so many women are pregnant who don't want to be.

"Women act out the feelings of inferiority" by not taking responsibility for contraception, he said.

Maguire characterized the pro-life movement as "fixated, narrow, and tied to right wing politics." The way these activists characterize women who choose abortion as "lusty sluts" amounts to nothing more than "sexism and misogyny," he said.

Maguire also criticized the policies of the Reagan administration and the silence of pro-life activists on the arms race.

"We spend $2 million per minute on preparation for death while 43,000 children whose personhood is not in question die every day due to insufficient food and vaccinations. Why is there such a fixation with pre-natal life instead of post-natal death?"

Maguire charged that the Catholic Church is giving a "wink and a nod" to an administration which has "increased the military budget by $6 million an hour and taken an additional $20 million from the lower fifth of the population while giving $35 to the top fifth."

"There is already a nuclear war being waged on the poor — we're taking food out of their mouths to buy these weapons we don't need," he added.

Maguire is a professor of moral theology at Marquette University and Notre Dame. He was also named by Ms. Magazine as one of the top 40 men of the decade.

Maguire frequently relied on personal anecdotes and experiences to reinforce his views on abortion. He visited an abortion clinic because "it is good to get close to the reality of these women's lives before you make a self-righteous condemnation of women you've never met."

Pagoda built for world peace in Leverett

Buddhist monks choose first nuclear-free zone for peace project

By STEPHEN HIGGINS
Collegian Correspondent

LEVERETT—Buddhists and non-sectarian volunteers are building North America's first peace Pagoda which will rise 100 feet above Cave Hill in this town of 1500 which is the first nuclear free zone in the country.

When completed, the dome-shaped cement pagoda will be filled with Burmese artifacts and will serve to stimulate thought about world peace.

"We really believe building peace pagodas helps change people's hearts and minds. It will remain as a source of light for people in this violent age," said Claire Carter, a Buddhist nun.

The daily turnout of workers ranges from 15 to 50 people from all parts of the continent, according to Bob Davidson, an on-site architect from British Columbia, Canada. Construction begins at 6 a.m. and continues until dusk.

"It's truly amazing and moving to see all different kinds of people donating all different kinds of things," Carter said. Food donations help feed the workers, some of whom stay in a renovated barn below the pagoda site. The pagoda is being built on 70 acres of land donated by Warren Lett.

The 2500-year old practice of building pagodas, forgotten in the 20th century, was revived in Japan by the Most Venerated Nichidatsu Fujii, a Buddhist high priest, shortly after the atomic bomb was dropped. At the age of 60, Fujii spent eight years building a pagoda using his hands and a few crude tools.

"We really believe building peace pagodas helps change people's hearts and minds. It will remain as a source of light for people in this violent age."
— Claire Carter, Buddhist nun

Work on the pagoda, was begun last March under the direction of the Buddhist order Nipponzan Myohoji. It is expected to be ready for dedication by May 1985, when the 100-year-old Fujii, will come to Leverett.

The monks chose Leverett to build the pagoda partly because it was the first nuclear-free zone in the United States. Reaction to the project has been generally favorable in the town.

"People have been more interested and curious than antagonistic," Jane Davis, Leverett's administrative assistant, said.

"We are trying to help recover a righteous and passionate way to live," Carter said.

"We hope this is just a beginning."

Empties returned on campus

Bottles, cans redeemed in residential areas

By DAN WHITE
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts students don't have to trudge all the way to the grocery store to redeem their empty bottles and cans--they can return them at centers in their own residential areas.

The Student Redemption project is the only student-run redemption service in the state, and was started with a $4000 loan from the Student Government Association in 1983.

"We did a feasibility study on how many empties there were on campus and how feasible it would be to collect them. We discovered that there were an incredible amount of empties around here," said Lisa Vatske, a senior business law student and co-administrator of the project.

But one problem the redemption service faces is that, "Most people don't know we exist," Vatske said.

"Things usually start off slowly at the beginning of the school year and then build up as more and more people find out about it," said Michael Pattavina, operating manager for the Recycling Project, who serves as an adviser to the Redemption Service.

At present the service is averaging 4,000 returns a week, he said.

"This is about half the amount we need to keep going," Pattavina said.

Students get 5 cents per empty and the empties are then sold back to the distributer for 7 cents. The 2 cents per can and bottle goes for paying employees and paying off the loan from the SGA.

Alcohol ads get guidelines

By JIM AVERILL
Collegian Staff

The University Health Council has endorsed a 12-point resolution on the control of the marketing of alcoholic beverages on campus.

The resolution, which was compiled by The National Association of Student and Personnel Administrators, consists of 12 recommendations for various groups within the University to refer to when planning events or promotions that involve alcohol.

Some of the rules mentioned in the resolution are:

- promotion of alcoholic beverages should not encourage any form of alcohol abuse or place any emphasis on frequency or quantity of use.
- beverage alcohol should not be provided as free awards to students or campus organizations.
- beverage alcohol advertising on campus should not portray drinking as a solution to personal or academic problems or as necessary to social, sexual or academic success.
- alcoholic beverage marketing programs specifically targeted for students and/or held on campus should conform to the code of student conduct and should avoid demeaning sexual or discriminatory portrayals of individuals.
- no uncontrolled sampling as part of campus marketing programs should be permitted and no promotional activities should include "drinking contests."

While this resolution is not University policy, most members of the UHC adhere to it, said Dr. David P. Kraft, executive director of University Health Services.

"This resolution is a step in the right direction, but I don't think it goes quite far enough," Kraft said.

The UMass Marching Band, the football team, the UMass cheerleaders, football Coach Bob Stull and women's soccer Coach Kalekeni Banda are all expected to attend the bonfire and help lead the annual pre-game pep rally.

At 8 p.m. in the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall, the department of music and dance will present a special concert, "Tribute to the Big Bands," featuring Jeff Holmes and the University Jazz Ensemble.

"Decades" is the theme this year for the traditional homecoming parade through Amherst Saturday morning. Floats representing the 1920s, 30s, 50s and 60s have been constructed by various sororities and fraternities, and by Leach and Washington Tower residence halls, said Todd Thomas, assistant coordinator of Greek Affairs.

The parade, which will be led by the Minuteman Marching Band and UMass cheerleaders, will leave Haigis Mall at 11 a.m. and proceed down Massachusetts Avenue to North Pleasant Street, and through the center of town. The route then turns right onto Amity Street, following it to University Drive and then proceeding on to the stadium.

At the stadium, the Minutemen and the University of Connecticut's Huskies will clash on the gridiron at 1 p.m., as the two teams square off for another episode in the long standing rivalry.

After the game, there will be a reception in the Student Union Ballroom in honor of the reunion classes of '69, '74 and '78, to which alumni and friends are invited.

More than 20,000 spectators jammed the fenced-in area of Boston's City Hall plaza yesterday to hear President Ronald Reagan speak.

President supports Shamie: 'He'll work for growth, jobs'

By RITA MURPHY
Collegian Staff

BOSTON--At 12:10 yesterday afternoon, a man in a blue suit approached the bare blue podium facing a crowd of nearly 20,000. He reached forward and placed the presidential seal firmly of the lecturn. A local elementary school marching band played "Hail to the Chief" and in strolled the president of the United States. And Ray Shamie.

Shamie, a self-made millionare, is about six to nine points behind Lt. Gov. John Kerry in the battle for the U.S. Senate seat being vacated by Paul Tsongas.

According to many political analyists, Reagan's visit to "the Hub of the universe," as the president called it, was more for Shamie's political future than his own.

The president repeatedly told the crowd that Massachusetts needs Shamie.

"All of us need Ray Shamie in the Senate because he'll work for growth, prosperity and jobs. He knows better than most that jobs are the key to opportunity.

"Ray Shamie cares about the people of Massachusetts . . . . He went into public service knowing the odds were against him, but the truth ultimately prevails. And he will prevail next Tuesday if you all help him," Reagan said of the conmediate nuclear weapons freeze while supporting a strong national defense and a constitutional amendment calling for a balanced Budget.

Following the rally, Shamie said the president's visit will help his campaign, but "I could have won on my own and I will now.

"When the president of the United States asks to help, I take it."

Shamie said he thinks he will do especially well in Tuesday's election among college-age students.

"I certainly hope and expect to do well at UMass. Young people will surely want to vote for me. I represent the plans for the future."

Following the rally, several verbal fights broke out between Mondale and Reagan supporters. In one instance, one man said that because of Reagan he has been without a job for over two years, and because he's not educated, doubts he'll be able to get one. Another man then told him he should open up the want ads, and the group quickly grew in size. The incident turned into a prolonged shouting match lasting well over 20 minutes.

Two senior citizens, one 75-year-old Evelyn Bernard of Tewksbury, called the rally "one of the greatest moments of my life. He's the best man this country has ever had. He's so warm, so friendly."

"Tufts will focus on a 'no first strike' policy and Washington University in St. Louis will rally on halting nuclear arms and research at their school," he said.

Waskow said students at the University of Colorado will propose referendum similar to Brown's.

Fitzgerald said the Peacemakers hope the "die-in" will influence voters "to vote for candidates who will work for the end of the arms race" and provide a scenario of what conditions would be like in the event of a nuclear war.

The participating schools have also planned to encourage students to call CBS News in New York between 2 and 5 p.m. today to "say they are concerned about nuclear war and its aftermath" at (212) 975-4321.

Stockbridge appreciative

I would like to thank the Collegian for their recognition of the Stockbridge School of Agriculture. We were happy to see three photographs of Stockbridge events published last Thursday. The 318 students of Stockbridge are an important part of the University and quite often our events go unnoticed. Stockbridge is looked down on quite often in spite of all our contributions to the University and the campus and we are pleased to receive some positive recognition. Once again we thank the Collegian for recognizing Stockbridge.

Rally causes resentment

They represent a frightening cold war attitude: detente is dead. They do not represent the values of people concerned with the quality of life in America and around the world. They represent environmental degradation by attempting to deflate environmental policies and regulations that protect America's environment and Americans' health.

The UMass Republican Club at its rally on Wednesday insinuated that those who support Mondale and other candidates are un-American. According to the club, we are un-American because we support a supposedly communist-backed nuclear freeze movement in the U.S., we care about people rather than corporate interest, we care about clean air and water, and we care about public education and equal rights.

I resent being told through innuendos that I am un-American. I resent being told that as an opposition party member I have left America.

I am proud to be an American who backs human rights, a nuclear freeze, protection of the nation's environment, and Americans' health. This is a great country, and we have come a long way in 204 years. As an American, I will not vote for a leader who embraces all Americans on T.V. and alienates America with his policies on public education, the environment, equal rights and foreign affairs.

Fluoridation needs thought

As a member of the Five-College community, I write to express my concern over the impending vote on the fluoridation question. When the Board of Health ordered the fluoridation of the Amherst water supply last May, they knew that the matter could not come to a vote on November 6 unless 10 percent of the registered voters signed a referendum petition within 90 days. They also knew that thousands of voters were University students, most of whom would be away for the summer. Concerned citizens managed to get the signatures anyway, but had they not, students at the University would in effect have been disenfranchised on the fluoridation question.

This question has always been controversial, partly because scientists do not agree on the effectiveness or the safety of fluoridation. Boston's Forsyth Dental Center reported that people in unfluoridated areas were experiencing "marked decreases in caries prevalence approximating those expected from lifetime exposure to fluoridated drinking water." Thus, a nationwide decline in tooth decay rates is not necessarily a consequence of fluoridation.

In 1978 Judge John P. Flaherty, now a justice of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court ordered an injunction against fluoridation in a large portion of Allegheny County after hearing extensive scientific evidence in court. Judge Flaherty wrote in 1979: "In my view, the evidence is quite convincing that the addition of sodium fluoride to the public water supply at one part per million is extremely deleterious to the human body, and a review of the evidence will disclose that there was no convincing evidence to the contrary." He also noted that "the proponents of fluoridation do nothing more than try to impugn the objectivity of those who oppose fluoridation."

Let us bear these things in mind as we read the charges and countercharges to be found in the local press.

Democracy is not consistant

I would like to ask Mr. Dow (October 26) if he gets his information directly from the White House, or perhaps he gets it from CIA pamphlets dealing with the neutralization of Central America. Dow likens democracy in El Salvador to democracy in Costa Rica and Grenada. Comparing Costa Rica to Grenada is ludicrous, Costa Rica is a peaceful democracy, with a strong middle class and virtually no army, though the Reagan administration would like to change that. Grenada is a tiny island overrun by U.S. Marines last year in the name of democracy. I don't question that the people of Grenada were frightened and perhaps in danger at the time of the military coup last year. However, anyone who has kept up with the situation in Grenada realizes that, if anything, the continued U.S. military presence there has scared off their once thriving business, tourism.

As for El Salvador, Dow obviously has picked up on the Reagan administration's view of supporting oppressive military dictators in the name of fighting communism. Many people do not realize that the problem in El Salvador is not simply a question of communism vs. democracy. It is a question of a severely oppressed and very poor mass of people controlled by a few very rich families who have the support of the military. This problem has been going on since the early 1900s when Fidel Castro was barely into his diapers.

If my sister was raped, or my mother and father murdered by the government, I, too, could become desperate enough to pick up a rifle and oppose the government. Many of these rebels had never heard of communism before. They only knew misery, oppression, hatred, and murder of their loved ones. In El Salvador anyone who supported human rights and wished to help the poor was quickly executed and labelled a communist. Archbishop Romero was brutally slaughtered in 1979 by the military. He was a man of peace fighting for the oppressed. The Carter administration opposed military aid to El Salvador because of this murder and the other human rights violations.

A military victory cannot be won in El Salvador. You cannot keep people oppressed and continue to murder them at will without an armed uprising resulting. Only through peaceful negotiation can this problem be settled. Unfortunately, the policies of the Reagan administration make that possibility unlikely.

Open your eyes, America

Stephen Higgins

What's going on here? I was highly optimistic about the new vigor growing around the 1984 presidential campaign. The Ferraro rally enthusiasm was still fresh. Encouraged, I watched a presidential debate, in which Ronald Reagan absurdly and dangerously over-simplified the volatile foreign arena, displayed his undying ignorance of reality, and wrapped it all up by losing himself in a hazy reminiscence of a drive down the shining California coast.

In the same forum, Walter Mondale appeared intelligent, well-grounded and in command of the truth. Mondale's two major liabilities were lack of time to jump on Reagan's mistakes, and the circles under his eyes. It became even clearer to me that night that Ronald Reagan was not a justifiable candidate for a second term. To my surprise, in the following days support flowed gradually and dismally towards the Gipper.

How is this possible? I suspect that we as a nation have traded responsibility for charm. Sacrificed our integrity for mental sloth.

At this University, it is possible to meet those who contend that Reagan is the best foreign policy maker in not-so recent history, and many who credit him as being very good. "Peace through Strength" is the one-point foreign relations strategy Reagan's administration is feeding to the masses, diverting attention from his unprecedented failure to meet with any of the Soviet premiers. Reagan's "superiority" steeplechase, absent of dialogue, tempts our destruction. Yet we are swallowing the simple slogans and empty images handed us by the smiling actor. "America is Back", we're "Standing Tall" because we romped the tiny island of Grenada for reasons nobody can substantiate.

On the home front, our president has failed to a lesser degree, and inspired considerable confidence while doing so. Laudably, Reagan's inflation is half of what it was when he took office. At what cost? Unemployment is slightly higher than it was in 1980. The Pell Grant program has been cut 100 million dollars. Some students have dismissed this, asserting they don't want handouts anyway. What cannot be dismissed is the administration's denial of loans to 200 million students, while increasing the debt of all Americans by 200 billion each year. The huge budget deficit Reagan has created to finance the economic recovery is a "loan" from the American people. Does anyone feel cheated in paying for what Ronald Reagan takes credit? It has even been said that Ronnie is helping the "truly" poor in great numbers. He has in fact created greater numbers of truly poor, placing the burden of society on those already struggling at the bottom. Yes, we're back....to nineteenth-century stratified America.

Some claim the silver lining inside the Gipper cloud is George Bush. Optimism exists for a George Bush administration should Reagan's health fail. However, a strong man Bush is not. So dazzled by Reagan who sells himself well, Bush has also sold himself. To Reagan. He has surrendered his own beliefs to Reaganism for the ascension to power. Bush's revealing references to "blacks," as if it is a blanket term for all the minorities and underprivileged in America, is offensive. His stated belief that nuclear war is winnable is unrealistic. These, and his vaccilation to please Ronnie are not presidential qualities.

Real contemplation, I am convinced, will lead the majority of the unsided voters to the Democratic ticket. If this examination does not come about, Walter Mondale has a dim political future. Under such regrettable circumstances, I would offer this advice to Geraldine Ferraro: "You are articulate, tough, and principled, but that may not be enough. If you can land a space princess part in some fantasy flick, keep looking good, and learn to speak but say little, there will be no stopping you."

Open your eyes, America.

The wall of racism remains

Yadira Betances

When will the "civilized" American society ever come of age and end its backwards thinking of social inequality due to race?

I viewed several cases last week, which did not surprise me at all, but made me wonder of how far the American eagle has spread its wings of racism in society and how the American people have accepted it almost unanimously.

Take, for instance, what happened to a friend who has a strong accent. A white man made racial slurs about her "funny" accent because, he "felt like it."

A white woman friend was approached by a white man at a local bar and felt compelled to tell her that he was a racist. He then rattled on with derogatory statements about the black race. Since she is white, he thought she would understand his point of view.

Only yesterday, a Chinese sister was looked down upon when she attempted to take a table being vacated by some white men at the school cafeteria.

It's 1984, America. The walls of segregation crumbled down two decades ago. The United States of America was founded on the basis of "democracy" meaning of the people and for the people.

According to the laws of God and to the Declaration of Independence, all men are created equal with unalienable rights of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. Yet people are scrutinized because of their race, creed, color, nationality and religious beliefs.

In order to suck the venemous stings of racism out of the American society, there needs to be more education and more understanding of cultural and racial differences.

Some weeks ago, the Anti-Racism Team at SCERA had an introductory meeting, and no one showed up. What is that telling about the society? Of course there is a problem, but those inflicted with the disease do not want to find a cure.

There can be no progress without learning and there can't be a unified and cohesive society if the wall of racism hangs over America.

Racism will not end until America takes a good, hard look at itself and realizes that it is not white.

Not until this great nation of ours comes to understand and appreciate the contributions peoples of color have made to this society, America will not be the great nation it claims to be.

Indira: a fiesty leader of a turbulent nation

India once again has a tryst with destiny. The barbaric assassination of India's leader is a cruel reminder that the world is beset with ugliness of all kinds. There are several politicians today but very few leaders. In the demise of Indira Priyadarshini Gandhi, the world has lost another leader in the genre of Marshall Tito, John F. Kennedy and Anwar Sadat.

India is a collage of religious and cultural variations. This rich heritage weaves the fabric of a strong and proud society. But time and again these variations manifest themselves as sparks of differences erupting in a towering inferno. There has been turmoil twice: the first communal tension resulted in the assassination of Mahatma Gandhi — the father of the nation; the second eruption of communal tension has resulted in the death of Indira Gandhi, whom many regard as the mother of the nation.

In paying Indira Gandhi a tribute, one observes that she was a controversial figure in a land of controversies. That's what made Indira unique and that is what makes India unique. She was adored and admired, revered and feared, and at times, lauded and loathed. Her life was a saga of politics. As a young girl of 12 she burnt her fine British garments as an expression of her will to fight for a free India. As India's first woman prime minister she acquired a nation described as a "quagmire of poverty" and molded it into an agricultural land self-sufficient in food. On the international front she was the voice of the third world; she treasured a non-aligned India which irritated both superpowers. In both domestic and international affairs Indira Gandhi was a keen strategist and an adroit executor of her plans and visions. Of course, she had her flaws, like the imposition of emergency, but leaders make mistakes, and so did she.

As I and my countrymen watch India's new tryst with destiny with nervous tension, we pray for a strong, secular and democratic India. It seems apposite to call on the words of fellow countrymen and Nobel laureate Rabindranath Tagore "Into that Heaven of Freedom my Father let my country awake!"

Letters to the Editor

Free speech rights are vital

The only account I have of the events of Wednesday, October 31, involving the rally held by the UMass Republican Club is the Collegian account of what transpired. To the best of my knowledge this is the second time in recent months when demonstrators have exceeded the bounds of free speech to harass and threaten the rights of others to free expression. Such behavior is not appropriate in a democratic society. It is contrary to campus regulations. I hope all members of this community will join me in expressing our commitment to an atmosphere in which civility and freedom of expression is cherished.

Are we being un-American?

The recent awarding of the Nobel Peace Prize to Bishop Tutu of South Africa is heartening. And as he himself stated, it also honors those countless "little people" who struggle for better race relations.

Unfortunately, this concern for the oppressed — not only in South Africa but here — is not grasped by the Reagan Administration. Mr. Reagan's policy of "constructive engagement" with that nation's pro-apartheid government speaks poorly of our concern for civil rights. Certainly the arduous struggle for Blacks in America, expressed with such fervor by the late Dr. Martin Luther King and the civil rights movement which he guided, hasn't already been forgotten by our leadership. Or has it? Prophetically, the author George Orwell warned in his classic 1984 that those obsessed with maintaining power would rewrite history. And if it hasn't been rewritten, when we have Black teenage unemployment rates of 55 percent, the noble moments when America stood for equality have fallen into disfavor.

Encouraged at every turn to consider life chiefly in terms of material well-being, many people are frightened that their standard of living will be jeopardized if others achieve social and economic justice. Mr. Reagan panders to these fears with simplistic anecdotes — vaguely couched prejudice really — about welfare cheaters, food stamp fraud and various un-Americanisms. But isn't it un-American to neglect the truly needy, ignore hardship and turn selfishness into a new idol?

Black Affairs

Interest in political issues must be raised prof. says

By MARANN CASSELL
Collegian Staff

It is very important for Black students to raise their interest on what is happening in the Black community, with relations to a political activity tied to a social strategy, according to Ronald Walters, coordinator of the Rev. Jessie Jackson campaign and a political science professor at Howard University who spoke at Hampshire College yesterday.

The politics of bargain rather than a political change should be talked about more, he said. The democratic party politics of racism contributed to the loss of the Rev. Jackson's campaign, rather than they losing control of the party.

William Strickland, UMass Afro-American studies professor said, "who does one vote for? Mondale may be a fool, but Reagan is a devil. Neither one is valid. A different system of beneficiary vote must be created."

Dr. Donald Cleaveland assistant to chancelor Joseph Duffey questioned the lack of internal organization, and what are blacks as leaders going to do about the leader for the next four years.

Walter also addressed the problems of the split between Mondale black supporters and Jackson's black supporters.

"85 percent and more blacks voted for Jackson." A large number of Jackson's black delegates were later appointed to Mondale's delegation, he said, which raised the question of legitimacy of those elected or those appointed.

When it came to making decisions, he said, the black delegates were refrained from using their powers that they could have had with the Rev. Jackson. With Mondale the Blacks became clients rather the independence they had with Jackson, he said.

Walters pointed out one of the importance about Rev. Jackson's campaign was that during his candidacy he made trips to South America, Cuba and the Middle East. His interest in the issues confronting these countries should at least make the voters aware of the issues he stood for and how seriously he was about solving them. "This we do not see in any of the candidates," he said.

The Rainbow Coalition is not dead we have form a national cooperation, that has a branch in nearly every state of America, Walters said.

Students get a view of college life

By YADIRA A. BETANCES
Collegian Staff

Ninety high school students from high schools in the Boston area visited the University of Massachusetts yesterday to become acquainted with the college environment and to learn more about UMass.

Jamaica Plain High School, Madison Park High School and Another Course to College, a preparatory school students and counselors spent a full day of activities known as College Awareness Day where they learned statistical facts, as well as UMass life styles, academic programs and application deadlines, for recruiting efforts.

Reynold Winslow, director of the Minority Engineering Program emphasized personal goal in career pursuit as he introduced the University to the high school juniors and seniors.

Winslow said students will not be cheating themselves if they choose UMass because of the support programs for minorities available at the University.

Speaking on student activities and core-curriculum activities, Sherwood Thompson, director of the Office of Third World Affairs accentuated the importance of getting involved.

A new approach to the college awareness day is a student panel discussion whereby university students answer questions about academic and social life at UMass.

"It allows other students to give them (high schoolers) their perspectives of what it is to be a student at UMass," Rudy Jones, Assistant Director of Freshman Admission said.

Jones said he was "extremely pleased" with the student's enthusiasm and participation in the program. He was also pleased with the repoll between university students and the high schoolers, but he was disappointed with the little attention the media has placed on these recruiting efforts.

"It is the most effective way of recruiting them." Jones said the visit helps them better decide if they want to attend the university or not.

Jones said the percentage of students who attend the university after participating in the program is "decent" if measured by the level of interest and participation during the program.

The prospective students found the university a good academic institution with a "nice atmosphere." The College Awareness Day gave them a clearer view about the University and what is expected of them.

"It was interesting. I learned a lot about different programs and what's expected of you here," said Cheryl Graham, a Madison Park senior.

Steven Johnson, a senior at Another Course to College was glad he came. He learned the university has a good engineering school, something, he said he did not learn from reading the university catalog.

"Iwant to succeed," said Lizbette Marrero, a senior at Jamaica Plain High School "and I have heard the University is good," she said.

Although Graham is undecided on what career to pursue, she said, "I can't do it with (my) high school diploma."

Film offers no solution

By MARANN CASSELL
Collegian Staff

The resource map of South Africa looks like a jigsaw puzzle. The whites have taken 80 percent of the land that are of natural resources, they have given the black Africans 30 percent of the land with no natural resources.

The whites have build conservation camps for the Africans, for the whites to take tours. This is an example of human rights in it's highest form of degregation.

The White Lager is a film that gives the historical overview of the situation in South Africa shown at Amherst College Tuesday and sponsored by the Five College African Student Association.

In this film one sees how the western ideas have been superimposed in the black country of South Africa. Blacks in South Africa are less then second class citizens in their own land.

The leaders in South Africa feel that in order to keep Blacks from taking over "their land," the Whites must use the bullet to succeed.

The film showed one of the earliest battles where the Zulu tribe of 10,000 came to fight with spears and traditional weapons. The whites, using guns and cannons, left over 5000 South Africans dead and the Whites did not lose one of their men because they stood behind a stone wall and fired into the rushing Zulu army.

Today this battle ground is built as a monumental shrine where thousands of Whites take pilgrimage to every year or so, to celebrate "their" victory.

The movie also showed how the white leaders of South Africa persecute those Whites who speak up against Aparthied.

Dofi Afusi, an Afro-American Studies professor at Amherst College said as most Africans will say "when the shite man came we had the land, and they had the Bible, now they have the land and we have the Bible."

Although the movie presented a realistic view of the problems plaguing the black nation, it made no attempt to find solutions to Apertheid.

The problem of South Africa will not be solved today, Afusi said. The struggle is not between South Africans and Whites, it is about fundamental Justice equality. This is not to say that their will be reverse racism. We understand the whites in South Africa have nowhere to call home. All we are asking for is that human rights in South Africa to be respected, Afusi said.

BCP New advisor has plenty to add

By CAROLINE ROTHKEGEL
Collegian Correspondent

Understanding the hardships of life as a refugee, the Billingual Collegiate Program's new advisor wants to educate the community on the history of Vietnam, besides helping students academically.

Lucy Nguyen, who started her post in September, will be advising mainly Hispanic and Asian students. She helps them with academic, personal and economic problems as well as informing them of how to take advantage of the various services offered at UMass. "Students see me as a mother," she said.

As a native of Central Vietnam she can identify herself with foreign students, especially Vietnamese, most of whom had to flee from their country and come to a totally different culture because of the political situation there.

Nguyen believes UMass is a wonderful place for foreign students because of its diversity, openness and uniqueness. Her message to students is that the key to success is "fighting, perserverance and patience," although she warns them to seek help on time and not wait until it is too late.

Nguyen feels that more can be done to help students by educating the community itself. "I want the community to learn about Vietnam's 4,000 year civilization, people know too little about Vietnamese culture and can only recall the Vietnam war of the 60s."

Besides her counseling at the BCP, she will also be giving lectures about Vietnamese history and culture as part of workshops for teachers a the local junior high school.

Nguyen received a masters degree in teaching from the University of Saigon, Vietnam, and a doctorate in French from the University of Massachusetts.

Striking punk

TOO TOUGH TO DIE
The Ramones
Sire Records

By JON STRYMISH
Collegian Staff

Ten years ago the Ramones were born in the bars and backstreets of New York. They originated a new breed of aesthetics based on volume and speed. Leather jacketed and alone, the Ramones preached the gospel of the loser.

As musicians they became cartoon characters for independence, determined to be accepted on their own terms. In their time they've seen all their punk buddies from their scene (Television, Patty Smith, Richard Hell) fall only to see their style capitalized on by the Sex Pistols and a hundred other English groups.

Although they have sold few records and are still playing in bars, The Ramones have been one of the most studied and critically popular bands. For ten years they have been slowly, very slowly, evolving and making concessions to popular consciousness. Their newest disk, Too Tough To Die, puts an end to this. You might say this misunderstood band has given up fighting for their life and allowed themselves to die and go to Ramones heaven.

The production is good. What is most striking about The Ramones' music is not the changes they have made, but the concessions that have been made towards them. A close comparison between The Ramones and Bruce Springsteen's Born In The USA (without voices) makes this very clear.

The Ramones have proven their sincerity. They are right for people who think there have been two important popular music milestones in the last 15 years: The Sex Pistols to bring excitement into music, and the Cars to take it back out.

Jeff Holmes will direct the UMass Jazz Ensemble I in a Tribute to the Big Bands on Friday, November 2, 8 p.m. at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall. The free concert will also feature several guest soloists.

Theater news

By RONDA APPLEBAUM
Collegian Staff

The following is a list of theatrical productions which will be presented in the five-college area from November 1-3.

The Seagull by Anton Chekov will be presented at the Curtain Theatre at UMass at 8:00 p.m.

Tickets are $3.00 for students and senior citizens and $4.00 for the general public. Call the University's Fine Arts Center box office for more information at 545-2511.

Moliere's The School for Wives will be performed at 8:00 p.m. in Theatre 14 at Smith College. General admission is $4.00; students and senior citizens $2.00. For reservations call 584-3023, weekdays 12:30-4:30 p.m.

Musical Chairs, a musical play in two acts by Barry Berg, Ken Donnelly and Tom Savage with music by Tom Savage will be presented at 8:00 p.m. in Hallie Flanagan Studio Theater at Smith. Admission: $2.00. For reservations call 584-3023, weekdays, 12:30-4:30 p.m.

CINEMASCOOP
by Count Ramin Zahed

Last Saturday night, I was telling myself, "Now Count, be reasonable. Although the worldly side of you might be tempting you to see Body Double, you should also pay attention to the spiritual-artsy part of your existence. Come on, stay home and watch PBS. Don't give in to those cheap DePalma thrills." But before I could say Masterpiece Theatre, I found myself trapped in the ticket line at the mall.

Yes, the film leaned on the sick side. Yes, the plot was not very dynamic and the dialogue was not exactly Proustian. Yes, there were many explicit scenes. But, boy did I enjoy myself. I guess I'm just a sick kind of guy. One thing for sure, the film did not have a dull moment. Eat your heart out, Alistair Cooke.

If you are going to Boston this week, I force you to see Falling in Love. With DeNiro and Streep, nothing can possibly go wrong. The new Terri Garr movie Firstborn looks pretty good too. However, I believe The political movie of the season is The Killing Fields. This film is directed by Roland Joffe and is based on a Pulitzer Prize-winning column in the New York Times which reflects the Cambodian situation under the Khmer Rouge. It is also an account of the friendship between an American journalist and his Cambodian friend. You might be able to catch this film if you are in Boston or New York.

The good news is that we are finally getting A Soldier's Story in the area. Howard E. Rollins, Jr. whom you might remember from Ragtime, stars in this mystery of black and white social attitudes near the end of World War II. Note: This film did not get one single bad review as far as I can remember.

Weekend Planners: This weekend offers a mine of opportunities. You can catch the cool and offbeat Repo Man at Pleasant St., or stay on campus and see the ultimate, incredible, magnificent Rear Window. Hitchcock fans will be in frenzy at Amherst Cinema this Sunday. Stage-Fright is playing with another favorite of mine, To Catch a Thief. When I think about the late Grace Kelly, I think of this movie. There's something magical about her ice-cold beauty mixing with the old Cary Grant charm against the picturesque Mediterranean backdrop. Frankly, I flip every time I see it. If you enjoy Alan Bates's acting, I suggest An Englishman Abroad which is on PBS tonight.

Killer Question; Last week's answer; Demi Moore was Michael Cain's daughter in Blame It on Rio. Clever lot, no one answered. Does anyone read this column or what? Well, this week might be a bit easier; If you can tell me what movie DeNiro and director Ulu Grosbard collaborated on before Falling in Love, you shall win two free passes to the sneak press preview of Oh God, You Devil, the latest from dirty old man George Burns.

Gifts from the Gods; More good news from Boston; Twentieth Century Fox has sent us 25, yes 25 free passes to see the hilarious The Gods Must Be Crazy on Thursday night at the Sack Copley in Boston. So if you're going to be in Boston on Thursday, you are a fool if you let this golden opportunity pass you by. Come by the Arts desk at the Collegian for your pass.

One final Scoop: American Film magazine has an excellent essay on Hitchcock written by Truffaut. Also, the Curtain production of The Seagull is really superb. Good luck on ye mid-terms.

Howard E. Rollins, Jr. stars as an Army officer investigating a murder in A Soldier's Story opening today at the Hampshire Mall.

MR. BUSH, IN RECENT WEEKS, WE'VE HEARD A LOT OF VULGAR LANGUAGE ABOUT MRS. FERRARO FROM YOU, YOUR WIFE, AND YOUR CAMPAIGN MANAGER.
WAS ALL OF THIS PART OF A PLANNED MANHOOD STRATEGY, TO COUNTER THE WIMP IMAGE THAT HAS PLAGUED YOUR POLITICAL CAREER?
ARE YOU KIDDING? I'VE ALWAYS TALKED TOUGH! WHEN I SAID I KICKED MRS. FERRARO'S BEHIND THAT'S EXACTLY WHAT I MEANT! AND YOU CAN PRINT THAT!
IN A FAMILY NEWSPAPER?
GOSH, YES! HECK, IT'S JUST AN OLD FOOTBALL TERM!
MR. BUSH, WHY DID YOU DECIDE TO PLACE YOUR MANHOOD IN A BLIND TRUST INSTEAD OF SOMEWHERE ELSE?
WELL, IT WAS REALLY THE PRESIDENT'S IDEA. HE'S VERY MUCH IN CONTROL OF THIS WONDERFUL ADMINISTRATION, AND I RESPECT AND ADMIRE HIM FOR IT!
WHERE TO KEEP THE VICE PRESIDENT'S MANHOOD IS JUST ONE OF THE TOUGH DECISIONS A PRESIDENT HAS TO MAKE. LBJ, FOR INSTANCE, USED TO KEEP HUBERT HUMPHREY'S MANHOOD IN HIS POCKET.
DID MR. REAGAN CONSIDER THAT?
YES, BUT WE AGREED A BLIND TRUST WAS MORE DIGNIFIED

Maybe Walter Mondale does have a chance. When Gerry "7-7" deSimas goes 11-3, anything can happen. The multi-talented deSimas led the pack with his stellar week but still trails Peter Abraham by eight games. Both Tony Betros and Scott Hood, with 9-5 weeks, drew closer to Abraham who went 8-6. Abe holds a slim one game lead on Betros.

Football and frisbee winners crowned

By ADAM NAZIMOWITZ
Collegian Staff

In late scores from yesterday's intramural championships the Why-17 squad defeated HS1 20-7 in the co-rec football finals at the lower Boyden Fields.

In the Ultimate Frisbee championships the Rage took the coveted crown for the third straight season, downing a rugged Worthless and Weak unit 11-10 in heated action.

"We will be in the championships. We are playing for the seeding and the top rankings. We are trying to satisfy a team goal that has been with us the whole season," said Hixon.

With UConn's losses coming to ODU (2-1), UNH (4-3 in overtime), and a strong Penn State team (2-1 in OT) the Huskies must be respected, said Hixon.

"They have a good forward line and their midfielders are very strong," said Hixon. "Their defensive backs and their sweepers are probably the weakest parts of their game. That's what we'll try to exploit."

When UMass forwards Tonia Kennedy, Christine Kolot, and Judy Morgan get by the UConn defensive corps they will have to deal with goalie Terry Kicks. Kicks is a first team All-American player and should provide the Minutemen with one of their toughest challenges of the year.

"We're going to try to create as many opportunities as we can and take advantage of them," said Hixon. "We'll try to take away the opportunities for their midfielders to play the ball and then we'll try to play the ball as deep as we can in their territory. We're not going to do anything new. We'll take risks, there's no reason to play it safe this late in the season."

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

In case you didn't know, Alumni Stadium will be renamed the Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium before Saturday's game against UConn. Mr. McGuirk was UMass athletic director from 1948 to 1971.

Minuteman quarterback Jim Simeone and his brother, senior split end Bob, have set their sights on a number of UMass career and seasonal records.

Bob, a 6-0, 195 pounder, needs only four catches to tie Tim Berra's career record of 99 receptions. He needs only 201 yards to catch Berra's record for yardage gained. The older Simeone also needs 23 catches to tie the single-season record, again held by Berra. With three games to go, Bob should rewrite the record books providing Jim can get him the ball.

Jim, with 113 completions with season, needs only 19 completions to tie Noel Reebencker (1952). He also is fifth on the all-time career yardage list, fourth on the career completions list and his 25 completions against Maine was second best for a UMass quarterback (In 1976 Brian McNally picked apart UConn for 32 completions.)

Glenn Holden has been doing some serious hitting as of late. The free safety had 17 tackles against Maine and 16 against BU, as he was defensive player-of-the-game for both those weeks.

Black Bears challenge UMass men's soccer

Last home game for Donahue, Rudd, Ryneare

By SCOTT HOOD
Collegian Staff

Looking to tie the University of Massachusetts record for most wins in a single season, the men's soccer team engages the University of Maine Sunday on Boyden Field at 1:00 p.m.

With a 9-5-3 record and three games left, the Minutemen are solid candidates to set a new win record. However, UMass coach Jeff Gettler isn't looking past a Black Bear team that is 7-6-1, although they play mostly Division II and III schools.

"Maine is not a team we're taking lightly. They're well-coached, well-organized, and they're trying to play soccer. We just have to take the game totally seriously," said Gettler.

Besides pursuing a record-tying 10th win of the campaign, UMass is seeking revenge for a 1-0 loss suffered last year in Orono, Maine in which the Minutemen outshot the Black Bears 28-3, but came away empty.

"That game was probably our best game of the season with the ball," said Gettler. "None of our players have forgotten that game."

This Sunday will be the final home game of the 1984 season. Thus far the Minutemen sport a fine 6-2 slate on Boyden Field. It will also be the final game on Boyden Field for the three men most responsible for UM's outstanding defensive play this year, fullback Mike Rudd, sweeper Mike Runeare, and goalie Don Donahue.

In other sports action this weekend, the volleyball team, fourth in New England with a 24-14 record and still in good standing for post-season action in the ECAC championships, will travel to Eastern Nazarene University to take part in the MAIAW Tournament, the state championships, along with Lowell.

Coach Russ Yarworth's UMass Water Polo team travels to Brown University this weekend for the New England Water Polo Championships, in an attempt to qualify for the Eastern Championships next weekend.

The Minutemen, currently ranked third in New England behind Brown and Harvard, will take on Yale in their first game. The teams split their two games this season, with UMass winning the first encounter 7-4, and the Elis winning their most recent meeting 11-10 in overtime. The one-two scoring combo of Paul McNeil and Mike Hoover will once again be called upon to provide the offense, while goalie Fred Marius will have to come through with another solid performance for the Minutemen this weekend.

The women's cross country team has the week off, but the men will be in Boston to take part in the New Englands.

Coach Ken O'Brien sees Providence as the frontrunner with Boston College and Boston University right behind them.

"I'm hoping for an improvement on last year's performance, but we'll need great performances from three people," said O'Brien. "We are a strong team in our fourth and fifth runners, but we need to improve on our front runners to have a shot at it."

The women's swimming team will see its first action of the season as they travel to the University of Vermont for their first scheduled meet Saturday afternoon.

Also contributing to this story were Collegian reporters Adam Nazimowitz, Mike Levine and Christ Tremblay.

come through this week, which he has to, we have an excellent shot at winning."

Stull said that UMass needs to keep up the intensity they showed against BU, but avoid the crippling mistakes that has kept them from scoring.

"We played well, with intensity, against only four teams," Stull said. "That's Ball State, URI, Northeastern and BU. When we fail to score on a first and goal, fumble the ball, drop the ball, or run the wrong route, all the intensity goes out the window. We have to execute better to win, out stats our impressive, we're improving, but we aren't scoring the points we need to win."

"Indications point to a low scoring game," Stull said. "But I learned to ignore indications long ago. Anything can happen, as long as we are the better for it."

Big Homecoming weekend:

Football faces rival UConn

Minutemen need a victory

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

When the University of Massachusetts football team looks across the field at the University of Connecticut on Saturday at Alumni Stadium they will see something familiar.

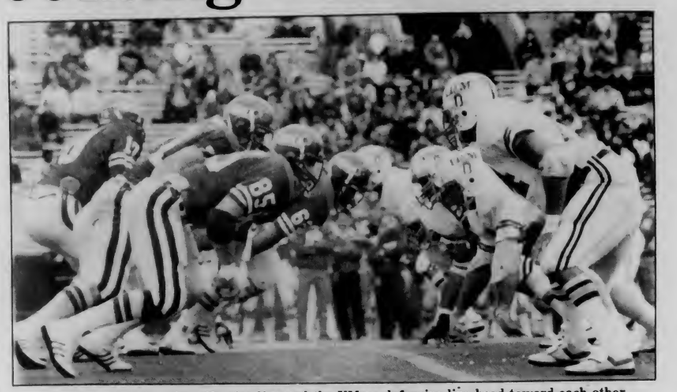
Both teams are 2-6, winless in the Yankee Conference (UMass is 0-2, UConn is 0-3), both teams have lost to Rhode Island, Lehigh and even Maine. The two quarterbacks complete under 50 percent of their passes. The defenses are the strong point of the teams, and of course both are riddled with injuries.

Yet, the 55th meeting between these interstate rivals should be a good one (1:00 p.m.) for the alumni returning for homecoming and for students who haven't seen their team in two weeks as both teams need victories badly.

Both UMass and UConn went 0-for-October as promising starts faded quickly into disappointing seasons.

The Minutemen lost to a solid Boston University team 31-21 last week in a game that featured hard hitting by the Minutemen and a quarterback change (for five passes) from junior Jim Simeone to freshman Mike Trifari. Both could happen again this week.

"We hit hard in practice again this week," UM coach Bob Stull said. 'Every position is open and that includes the quarterback. If Jimmy isn't moving the team or throwing the ball badly, I'm not afraid to go back with Mike, he's been in there, tested the waters and I'd like to see what he can do. Jimmy is still the starter for as long as he can do what we want him to do."



The Boston University offensive line and the UMass defensive line head toward each other last week in Boston. UM faces UConn on Saturday.

On the injury front, UMass returns several key starters.

Tight end Paul Walsh will be back as will linebacker Mike Favreau, who suffered a shoulder injury in practice before the BU game. Fullback Frank Fay will start as will tailback George Barnwell (623 yards on the season). Both had been questionable for the Terriers last week.

Still out however will be defensive tackle Ed Sullivan (knee), and linebacker Vito Perrone (leg). Tackle Mike Kowalski, Sullivan's replacement, will be spelled by linebacker Bruce Strange if his injured knee can't hold up.

UConn is also hobbled by injuries, especially at running back. Tailback Billy parks (572 yards) has a hip pointer but indications out of Storrs this week reveal he may see action. Fullback Gary DuBose has cracked ribs and will not dress.

UConn is first in the conference in defense, with a 41-0 rout against Holy Cross their only blemish. They held UNH to 13 points and Colgate to nine. They are fifth in the nation in pass defense.

"Obviously it's important for Barnwell to have a good game," Stull said. "He did not play well at BU, he fumbled twice and I was very disappointed in his effort. If he can

Second season starts for UM soccer women face Boston College

By GERRY deSIMAS
Collegian Staff

It's a whole new ball game for the fourth seeded University of Massachusetts women's soccer team as they take on the 11th seeded Boston College Eagles for the second time in a week in the opening round of the NCAA playoffs Saturday at 10:30 a.m. at Boyden Field.

"This game is another season," coach Kalekeni Banda said. "It's just one game at a time for us." UMass, 12-2-2 on the regular season, blew out BC 5-0 last Saturday.

"It won't be as easy as it was the first time," Banda said. "The bottom line is how much we want it. We respect BC very much."

The Eagles, who finished their regular season on Tuesday with a 1-0 win over Keene State, have beaten UConn and Cortland State, 2-2-1 this season. Both teams are in the NCAA's.

"They are capable of beating anybody on a given day," Banda said.

The key in last Saturday's win over the Eagles was the Minutemen's ability to score first. In three games, UMass has been scored upon first, they have lost two (1-0 losses to Brown and Harvard). UMass came from behind to topple Cortland State 2-1.

"Mentally, we need to score first," midfielder Jamie Wetson said. "There seems to be more frustration (if we don't score first). But we do have the ability to come back."

The one woman who has scored the bulk of the Massachusetts goals is freshman Jolie DePauw with 12 goals, five assists for 29 points. DePauw has also scored seven game winning goals.

In fact, seven of the eight top UMass scorers are freshmen. In all, six starters on the Minutemen are freshmen.

"We just have to play smart," Watson said. "We'll be asking the freshmen to grow up a little faster. If we can be smart and play a step above and think, we'll do alright."

"It's explossive," Watson said of the freshman attack force that includes DePauw, Monica Seta (7 goals, 1 assist, 15 points), Kristen Bowsher (6-3-15) and Carolyn Micheel (3-2-8).

"BC will be looking for the quick goal," Banda said. "They'll be better prepared. We want to come out and put high pressure on them right away."

Banda is thinking of moving the front line around to give BC something different to look at. Last week, Banda moved DePauw from center striker to wing and it opened up the middle for Christ Taggert, the senior co-captain, that scored twice.

Sophomore goalie Jeanne Paul sports a 0.46 goals against average and has eight shutouts in 12 games.

"We've outplayed everybody this year, even in the losses. But we have to get results. We have to put the ball into the back of the net and I would like to do that right away," Banda said.

"BC has nothing to lose," he said.

There will be an admission charge at the door to enter the game since it is an NCAA sanctioned event. UMass students with an ID will be charged a dollar and everyone else $2.

The winner of Saturday's game faces the winner of the Harvard-Vermont matchup for the right to travel to the Final Four. UMass took third at the Final Four last year. BC made the NCAA quarter-finals.

Field hockey "must win" at UConn to up ranking

By ED HAYWARD
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts field hockey team travels to the University of Connecticut for tomorrow's contest. Plain and simple, it is a big game.

UMass is ranked fifth in the nation. UConn is ranked a deceiving seventh. Both teams look to improve their post-season playoff positions. It is the final game of the regular season for both teams. A fierce rivalry has developed between the two New England powers. It is a rivalry UConn has dominated in recent years.

—November 5 1983: UMass 1-UConn 1.
—November 5 1982: UConn 2-UMass 0.
—November 22 1981: UConn 4-UMass 1 (playoffs).
—November 7 1981: UMass 1-UConn 1 (regular season).

The playoff loss was particularly painful as it came in the title game of the National Championships CNCAA's. UMass was seeded number one in those playoffs having compiled a 17-0-2 record. UConn was seeded second.

Tomorrow, the Minutemen will shoot for their first victory against UConn since October of 1980. UMass takes a 13-3 record into the game against the 14-3 Huskies.

"It's our biggest rivalry, no doubt," said UMass coach Pam Hixon. "We have always vied for the top spot in New England and every year this has been a big game. It always comes at the end of the season. It gives the team something to look forward to...playing a strong team."

Both teams are assured of playoff births but with a victory tomorrow the Minutemen would have a chance to recapture their previous week's ranking of fourth. By climbing into the number four spot, the minutemen would receive a bye in the NCAA playoffs. The top twelve teams make the tournament but only the top four are seeded, thus receiving byes in the first round.

While UMass defeated Boston University on Tuesday they dropped in the rankings by virtue of the University of New Hampshire's narrow 1-0 loss to defending national champion and currently number one ranked Old Dominion University. Earlier in the season UMass lost to ODU 7-1 and defeated UNH 3-1. UNH currently occupies the coveted number four spot.

Sexual harassment a frequent problem at UMass

By DEBORAH ROSS
Collegian Staff

Editor's note: This is the first article in a two part series on sexual harassment.

The high incidence of sexual harassment at the University of Massachusetts has become a serious concern, according to Grant Ingle, process consultant at the Office of Human Relations and member of the UMass Sexual Harassment Education Committee.

Sexual Harrassment on Campus

Sexual harassment is a "large problem in our society," Ingle said, "and UMass reflects that."

In a Student Affairs Research and Evaluation Office (SAREO) telephone survey of 237 graduate and undergraduate women for the UMass Sexual Harassment Committee in the spring of 1983, 25 percent of the women surveyed said they personally had experienced sexual harassment at UMass.

University policy states that sexual harassment includes "Unwelcomed sexual advances, requests for sexual favors, and other verbal or physical conduct of a sexual nature."

Half of the women surveyed said they had experienced negative remarks about females, the stereotyping of women in sexually derogatory ways, and sexual remarks about their appearance or sexual activity by course instructors or other staff member.

Ingle said the SAREO figures are "probably deflated" and Howard Gadlin, UMass Ombudsman and co-chairperson of the Sexual Harassment Committee, said the SAREO data "gives and inkling of the percentages," but it is not a sufficiently thorough study.

Ingle said the UMass study did not include female staff and faculty and thus underestimated the incidence of the problem.

He cited a Harvard study conducted in September 1983 which found that 49 percent of untenured women faculty reported experienceing sexual harassment, as did 40 percent of graduate student women and 35 percent of all women surveyed.

Carol Johnson, assistant manager for Staff Training and Development and the co-chairperson of the Sexual Harassment Committee at UMass, said even the Harvard data is a "conservative estimate." She added that "the incidence of sexual harassment if very high."

University Ombudsman Gadlin said "You hear enough about it to know that it is an on-going problem to be taken seriously."

Johnson said the problem arises because "rules have changed and what used to be acceptable behavior is no longer acceptable."

"It's a problem of a male-dominated society," said Ingle, "in which men's traditional attitudes towards women transfer to the workplace."

He said men "Related traditionally to women as mothers, daughters, sisters and wives and don't relate to women as colleagues in the workplace."

Although sexual harassment occurs in all gender combinations, the victims are predominantly women. Johnson said she doesn't "blame men," but that "they're at an adolescent stage about this."

She said "It's an awkward stage in which men do not know what sexual harassment is." For example, she said, men ask her "Can I still tell jokes?" to which she replies "yes...so long as they're not sexist or offensive."

She said "people don't know how to adjust" to different cultural circumstances and that although change will be a slow process "we can't afford not to deal with this issue."

Tomorrow's installment will focus on the legal issues and available procedures for harassment victims.

Democrats stage rally in Amherst center

By LAURA YEE and
JOEL P. COFFIDIS
Collegian Staff

Amherst and other local Democrats held a rally and "teach in" Saturday on the Amherst Town Common in a final attempt to either strengthen or sway undecided voters to their side of the presidential ballot before Nov. 6.

The 16 groups, including Amherst College Democrats, the Amherst College Progressive Student Alliance, Physicians for Social Responsibility and the Belchertown Citizens for Peace, sponsored the four-hour rally where politicians, professors and activists spoke before a crowd of about 150.

Polls that show President Reagan and George Bush in the lead are "wrong," according to Rep. James Collins (D-Amherst), who is running for re-election.

"This week, Mondale and Ferraro broke all records in Chicago, Seattle . . . with the biggest turnout in Government Center (Boston) and in New York," Collins said.

Collins cited the 1948 elections when polls predicted that Harry Truman would lose the election that he won. "Polls lie," Collins said.

"If the polls are right, the American people are as stupid as those right wing fanatics and Ronald Reagan," Michael Thellwell, a professor of Afro-American studies at UMass, said.

Bob Weiner, chairman of the Amherst Town Committee task force who focused his speech on getting people to the polls, said President Reagan "has started a reign of terror" and Ray Shamie "is a dangerous man."

"Let's make sure Reagan doesn't win by 3,000 votes again" in Massachusetts, he said. "Reagan is the reason for gloom and doom."

Pat Lewis Sackrey, who has never held political office and is running for Hampshire County Commissioner said, "We want Mondale and Ferraro to win because we want time in this world."

Mary Wentworth, who is running against Rep. Silvio Conte, focused on the Reagan administration's strategy in dealing with the potential dangers of war.

"Ronald Reagan rides through the international arena shooting off his six guns, terrorizing the world," Wentworth said.

Sidney Alexander, president and one of the founders of Physicians for Social Responsibility, said that the danger of nuclear war is the primary threat to our lives.

"This is not a political issue, it's a moral and biological issue," Alexander said. "Nuclear war and the threats have no cure. The only treatment for nuclear war is prevention."

During the rally, moderator and senior Amherst College chemistry major Michael Shorr induced the crowd to shout chants of "four more days," in reference to a hopeful end to Reagan's presidency, "Fritz and Gerry", "out the door, no more Reagan in '84" and "no more Ron."

Hecklers were at a minimum but Shorr said some Reagan supporters held a counter rally earlier in the day.

SGA debates funds for student groups

By BOB BURGESS
Collegian Staff

Questions on Student Government Association (SGA) work on pornography and anti-oppression have surfaced as a result of The Undergraduate Student Senate's decision last wednesday to freeze funds of groups that "attempt to influence censorship" at the University of Massachusetts.

Debate continued at the end of last week on First Amendment rights of students versus the student government's role in carrying out anti-oppression work.

Southwest senator Craig McDermott, sponsor of the motion passed last Wednesday, said his motion was raised in response to a movie policy introduced in the senate Oct. 10 and later removed. The policy was to "prohibit. . . the showing of x-rated motion pictures and other media material which graphically (depict) the brutalization or sexual degradation of any class of people" at UMass.

Although that motion was removed, McDermott said "I don't think any government, whether federal, local, or student, has the right to intervene in a person's decision on whether he or she wants to see a film. It goes against the grain of democracy and freedom."

SCERA student Coordinator David Martin, who sponsored the movie policy proposal, said he did not see any immediate reprecussions of the senate vote. But he said, "Eventually the senate may attempt to construe the wording (of the anti-censorship motion) to freeze funds of groups which are doing work which the senate disagrees with.

"I advocate freedom of expression," Martin said, "but that is according to my definition. I see the brutalization of women as being anything but a freedom."

Director of the Student Center for Education and Research Advocacy (SCERA), Debbie Piltch, said Thursday that the senate vote would impede the progress made by SCERA in educating students on anti-oppression.

Presently, the senate and SCERA hold awareness workshops which are mandatory for new senators. The workshops are designed to make senators more sensitive to racism, sexism, and homophobia.

Nicaraguans wait for election returns

MANAGUA — The ruling Sandinistas confidently awaited victory yesterday as large numbers of Nicaraguans voted in their first election in 10 years despite a boycott by the government's main political opposition.

Even before polls closed, supporters of the leftist Sandinistas set off firecrackers to celebrate their expected victory. The fireworks could be heard throughout Managua.

Lines formed at polling places throughout the country before the polls opened at 7 a.m. Many waiting to vote wore T-shirts, hats and other items of clothing emblazoned with the red-and-black insignia of the Sandinista National Liberation Front.

Mariano Fiallos, the president of the Supreme Electoral Council, said preliminary returns indicated a turnout higher than the 80 percent forecast by the government.

Eleven of Nicaragua's almost 4,000 polling places - all in the northern part of the country - were disrupted by violence, and one policeman was killed, he said.

"Up to now we only have to be sorry for the death of one policeman," he said without elaborating.

The Sandinista government had announced that early returns would be announced last night. But later it said no results would be reported until today. It did not give a reason for the delay.

'Most Wanted' arrested

CLEVELAND—The FBI arrested five people in northeast Ohio yesterday, including Raymond Luc Levasseur, an alleged terrorist group member who has been on the agency's 10 Most Wanted list since 1977, the agency said.

FBI Director William said in a prepared statement from Washington, D.C., that Levasseur, 38, was apprehended along with his common law wife, Patricia Gros. They were arrested while riding in a van in Deerfield, where they had been living, said John Dunn, an FBI spokesman in Cleveland.

Arrested in Cleveland were Jaan Karl Laaman, 36, Richard Charles Williams, 37, and Barbara J. Curzi, 26, according to Webster.

Webster said Levasseur has been identified as a member of the Sam Melville-Jonathan Jackson Unit, which he said has financed terrorist activites through bank robberies and has claimed responsibility for several bombings in New England.

Hunger striker wins demands

WASHINGTON — A community activist who abandoned a business career to become an unpaid crusader for the capital city's down-and-out ended a 51-day fast yesterday after the Reagan administration agreed to renovate a shelter for the homeless.

Mitch Snyder, 41, was admitted to the intensive care unit of Howard University Hospital, shortly after President Reagan acceded to the demand and four hours before millions of television viewers were to see him featured on CBS' "60 Minutes" program.

WHY YOUR WATER SUPPLY SHOULD NOT BE FLUORIDATED

Know these facts before you vote on Nov. 6th

Is the principle of water fluoridation the same as that of chlorination? (Chlorination treats and purifies the water supply. Fluoridation treats and medicates the individual.)	NO
Is fluoridation of the water the only means of providing fluoride treatment for young children? (Flouride tablets, drops, tooth pastes and topical applications are available to those wishing flouride treatment.)	NO
Is fluoradition of the water supply universally accepted? (In several countries, flouradition of the water supply has been nationally banned. In Denmark, Sweden, West Germany, Italy and France, fluoridation has been nationally rejected.)	NO
Is there any scientific proof that water fluoridation is harmless to the human body? (Dr. J.J. Rae, associate professor of chemistry and Ph.D. in biochemistry and organics, University of Toronto, states . . .'It is known as a scientific fact that fluoride is deadly poison to enzymes, upon which all life depends.')	NO
Is it economical to fluoridate the entire water suply when less than 1% of the fluoridated water supply reaches the children claimed to benefit? (Wasteful expenditures of the taxpayers' money is not consistent with sound municipal economy.)	NO
Should the public water supply be used for the purpose of carrying a potentially toxic, potentially cumulative, fluoride chemical into our bodies daily? (The public water supply should NEVER be made available for mass-medication of the entire community.)	NO
Should the individual be denied his right to freedom of choice concerning the substances he may wish to take, or prefer not to take, into his own body? (Amendment XIV of Section 1 of the United States . . ."No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States.")	NO

WHAT IS THE COST OF FLUORIDATION?

In many cases, actual cost of fluoridating the water supply has far exceeded original estimates.

In the past ten years, the following Massachusetts communities have discontinued fluoridation after a trial . . . Northampton, Andover, Cambridge, Hudson, North Andover, Reading, Wilmington and Williamstown.

Members of the UMass Peacemakers "die" Friday outside the Student Union Building to express their belief that nuclear war is suicide.

Effects of nuclear war shown

By LAURA YEE
Collegian Staff

A "die in" in front of the Student Union Building Friday to protest the possibility of a nuclear war left an "eerie feeling" among some students who saw the demonstration, while others thought it was "funny."

"After I saw the demonstrators pretend to die and heard the announcement, it left me with an extremely eerie feeling," Laura Yudow, a senior journalism major said. "All the protests and the attention focused on nuclear war in the presidential elections makes you realize that it could really happen."

At noon, about 25 to 30 members of the University of Massachusetts Peacemakers bedecked in black clothing and wearing somber, serious expressions marched to the Student Union from the Fine Arts Center to "die" as part of a demonstration on 17 college campuses nationwide.

Two demonstrators carried a banner that read, "Preparation for nuclear war is preparation for suicide."

Julie Fitzgerald, an organizer of the event, said the protest was organized by David Waskow, a student at Brown University, to bring awareness to the belief that "suicide is better than surviving a nuclear war."

About 70 people heard an announcement that said, "There has been a mistake, please proceed to the nearest fall out shelter and remain calm. . . this is not a test." A recording of a bomb exploding was then heard, which was met with grunting and groaning noises as the bodies fell to the ground. Other protesters then proceeded to outline with chalk the "dead" bodies.

During the demonstration that lasted about 15 minutes, some students joked and laughed.

"I thought it was funny," Bill Hurney, an electrical engineering graduate student, said. "A lot of people think it's stupid (the demonstration). Next thing you know, they'll be asking for cyanide here. . . they're a bunch of radicals."

But Lisa Putignano, one of the protesters and a junior comparative literature major, did not share those sentiments.

"We're not radical," she said. "But if wanting to life in peace and having our children live in a safe world is radical, then we are radical.

"I thought it was very effective and it made people stop and think that nuclear war is serious and is suicide."

Yale students suing school for $2 million over contract

By LAURA KOESTER
Collegian Staff

As the clerical and technical workers strike at Yale University enters its sixth week, students are escalating pressure on the administration to settle with the union and end the disruption of their academic and personal lives.

One hundred and two Yale law students have filed a lawsuit against members of the Yale administration and Board of Trustees and are trying to get the suit certified as a class action suit on behalf of the entire student body, according to Yale law student Susan Sachs.

"We are filing on the grounds of breach of contract. The University had all spring and summer to come to an agreement with the union. They know there might be a strike but they made no effort to notify the students of this possibility," Sachs said.

Sachs emphasized that students pay $14,000 per year to attend Yale, and that their academics have been "severely disrupted" by the strike.

"You can't eat fast food three times a day and expect to be healthy. It often takes a long time to get a meal because the restaurants are so crowded. The library hours have been cut down, loans are bottled up in financial aid, and lab results from health services take an inordinantly long time to get," she said.

The suit is asking $2 million per week in damages, according to Sachs. The students also want their second semester tuition placed in an escrow account until the strike is settled.

"Why throw good money after bad? Yale keeps saying what a liberal institution they are, but there have been five strikes here in 13 years. They don't understand that labor is a force to be reckoned with," Sachs said.

The university has not met with members of the negotiating team for two and a half weeks. In an effort to lure students across dining hall picket lines, Yale has been providing free dinners for first year students.

However, students suppoctive of the union set up their own picket line of 100 to 125 nightly, according to Jenny Sturnik, a member of Students for a Negotiated Settlement (SNS). As a result, the free meals have been cancelled.

SNS member Christopher Maider called the free meals a "slimy tactic."

"The University can afford free steak dinners for freshmen and scabs, but they calim they can't afford to pay their workers a decent wage," he said.

Maider cited the recent arrest of 150 students in an act of civil disobedience, called a "Witness," as evidence of growing solidarity between students and strikers.

Sturnik said SNS has been supporting the strike by fundraising for the hardship and strike funds, distributing information, and educating people on the issues by holding debates and forums.

SNS is also helping to organize a three-day strike just before Thanksgiving in which the union will attempt to completely shut down the University.

"We support the union's right to a fair contract. Students have to put pressure on the administration, which is being intransigent. We are in favor of binding arbitration," Sturnik said.

Last Thursday, Minorities in Support of Local 31, a coalition of students, faculty and community members, held a press conference to publicize the position of the minority community.

"New Haven has a very large minority population. There is a high unemployment rate, but minorities comprise only 13 percent of the Yale work force. This is not proportional representation," said Isabel Zambrano, a chicano student and active supporter of the union.

CIA, NSA arrive in Amherst

Responses are varied as interviews begin

By NANCY A. BUKAR
Collegian Staff

As representatives of the CIA and the National Security Agency bring their college recruitment campaigns to the area with expectations of high success, student groups are planning protests and local college administrators say interest in the agencies varies from school to school.

College campuses are "one of the major sources of where we (the CIA) get our employees because of their (students') advanced degrees," said Kathy Pherson, chief of media relations for the CIA in Washington, D.C. She said the agency expects a high success rate at all campuses where it conducts interviews, which are being held at three of the five area colleges and for the first time this year at Amherst College, where only information sessions were held in the past.

Susan Little, director of Amherst's Career Counseling Center, said the sign-up schedule for interviews with the agencies last week was not filled and some students staged a sit-in Friday to protest the recruitment (see related story).

The CIA and NSA do not have "a particularly high success rate here," Little said. "There isn't an overwhelming display on the part of students--not a great rush to sign up for interviews."

Arthur L. Hilson, director of Placement Services at UMass, said he expects to see some protests while the agencies are on campus, beginning today; Tim Hams of the Radical Student Union confirmed there would be action but refused to disclose its nature.

Two years ago, protestors entered the interview booths and destroyed student files, Hilson said, though students now have a chance to voice their opposition in a more peaceful way.

"Any group that has literature that states why a group shouldn't be here can have it placed in the Placement Office file along with the company's literature," he said.

Hilson said he sees the CIA and NSA as "employers looking for employees" and the groups are treated in the same way as others that recruit on campus.

"Our position is that we respect the will of the student body. The only reason we bring an employer here is because there are enough students who expressed interest," he said.

At Smith College, 35 women have signed up for interviews with the CIA, according to Barbara Reinhold, director of the Career Development Office. "We've had a longtime relationship with them (CIA and NSA)," she said.

Reinhold has been informed of protests that will occur on the Smith campus. "We expect that. The demonstration will be orderly," she said.

Hampshire College has not been contacted by either agency for recruitment purposes. "I think that we're not high on their list for a place to recruit," said Andrea Wright, director of the Career Options Resource Center.

Mount Holyoke's career center could not be reached for comment.

The agencies look to recruit research analysts with economics and political science backgrounds, students majoring in electrical engineering, computer sciences, mathematics, physics and Russian, Asian and Far Eastern languages, according to the various placement offices.

Recruiters "don't usually expect protests," but "they've learned to steel themselves against it," Pherson said.

Amherst students hold anti-CIA sit-in and rally

By JOHN YONCE
Collegian Staff

Chanting "CIA go away" and holding signs criticizing the agency for "international crime" and "terrorism," a small group of protestors staged a demonstration and sit-in Friday during CIA recruitment at Amherst College.

The CIA and the national Security Agency interviewed students at the college last Wednesday through Friday.

"We feel the CIA is a criminal organization using Amherst (College) facilities to recruit new members," said Jason Kliot, a junior political science-English major at Amherst and one of the protest's organizers.

The protestors asked to meet with the CIA recruiter, but Susan Little, director of the Office of Career Counseling at Amherst, said the recruiter would not meet with students because he felt "uncomfortable being a spokesperson for the CIA."

But the recruiter later agreed to meet with the group when his work was completed, after the protestors said they only wanted to express their views.

Amherst College has an "open recruitment" policy, Little said, which allows any corporation or organization that meets the school's affirmative action guidelines to recruit on campus.

Kliot said these guidelines are not enough because they do not have provisions for companies that discriminate on the basis of sexual orientation.

Little said the college administration is willing to discuss policy with its students, and that the protest "could be a beginning for dialogue."

Some people at the protest were not totally supportive of the protesters' position.

"Some people don't have qualms about working for the CIA," said John Shope, a sophomore Russian studies major. Although he said that he wasn't supportive of the CIA personally, Shope said "(We) shouldn't deprive people who are interested."

The sit-in, organized by the "CIA-out coalition," an Amherst group comprised of members of the Progressive Student Alliance and other student groups, was "very successful," Kliot said.

"Dean Little wants to start a forum to decide which groups can recruit on campus," he said. "We'll have student input into decisions."

Reversing a sorry situation

William J. Spain

During this presidential campaign, much has been made of the fact that millions of young people are whole-heartedly supporting Ronald Reagan. I have read this in the newspaper, seen it on TV and come in contact with it first-hand. Over the last few weeks, hundreds of UMass students have seen fit to curse at me and my fellow Democrats as we fan out accross campus with our Mondale-Ferraro signs and literature. Don't worry, I am not going to whine about it. I knew when I started that abuse comes with the territory. I am also aware that our rivals are not treated much better.

Of late, President Reagan has been speaking a lot about the patriotic fervor he sees in the eyes of young Americans. He finds their "U.S.A. First" attitude refreshing after living through the student riots and flag-burnings of the 1960's. Our older brothers and sisters used to drive people like him crazy. Things are rather different these days. The president and his men relish the idea of having the better part of a generation become unquestioning nationalists at the beck and call of the Republican Party.

Liberal enclave though it is, our lovely little community has its share of these individuals. Hopefully, some of them are reading this because I have a few questions you might like to ask yourselves. It is much more important that you can answer them to your own satisfaction than it is to anyone else's.

First of all, what inspired such an outpouring of affection for a living relic from the last century? Is it the laissez-faire dog-eat-dog capitalism that he promotes? Has the prospect of a new car and a nicer stereo completely overwhelmed your feelings for those less fortunate than you? Say it ain't so, folks.

Second, and more importantly, how far are you all willing to take it? Draft-age males should pay particular attention to this question. Conducting foreign affairs and being Commander-in-Chief are the most important responsibilities of our president. Right now, we have a man in control who sees the world as a kind of good vs. evil chess game with you-know-who as the pawns. I have faith that if the old guy suddenly went senile one day, his handlers would not pass on the order to launch the missiles. However, that won't keep our men's blood from being spilled in some jungle.

What disturbs me even more is on whose behalf our servicemen might die. Our government is still very much in the business of defending tyrants. The Reagan policy-makers see countries like South Africa and the Philippines as vital to our security. Both parties agree on that point. It is necessary to keep those nations from falling into the Soviet sphere. The problem is that our present policy is incredibly short-sighted. Every dictator is bound to fall sooner or later. Have we learned so little from the experiences of Iran and Nicaragua? The people of those areas have every reason to despise the United States. Amerıcan support kept them under the heels of brutual despots.

Our backing of power-hungry scumbags brings us down to the same level as our enemies. The "hearts and minds" of those we need to win over view the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. in the same way. Can you blame them? That really makes me sad. We have so much more to offer.

You can help reverse this sorry situation when you go into the voting booth tomorrow. As president, Walter Mondale will couple a firm stand against Soviet agression with a clear understanding of world problems. He knows that poverty is the chief cause of violent revolution in the third-world and the Russians just take advantage of it. Bluster and bravado may work great in B-grade movies, but we deserve better from our chief executive.

Sending out a firm signal

Stephen C. Erickson

Voters on this coming election day can easily measure the new economic prosperity that we have seen as a result of the Reagan administration relative to the hard times created by the Democrats. President Reagan's success in the area of foreign policy is less easy to perceive, but is nevertheless impressive.

One way to measure the success of Reagan-Bush in the area of foreign policy is to note what did not occur. Under Carter-Mondale, no less than five nations fell into the Soviet bloc, including Angola, Afghanistan, Yemen, Ethiopia, and Nicaragua. Under President Reagan's leadership not an inch of territory was lost to communist forces.

Faced with a leftist insurgency in El Salvador, the Reagan administration acted to both preserve U.S. interests and promote democratic ideals in that Central American nation. As Democrats like Walter Mondale and Chris Dodd pleaded against giving military support to the government of El Salvador, the Reagan administration persevered with economic and military aid, while encouraging economic reform and human rights. Had the Democrats had their way, military aid would have been withdrawn and the rebels would have triumphed. Democracy, as it presently exists in El Salvador, would be dead. The negotiations that have recently taken place between government and rebal leaders would never have occured. Central America would be on its way to having another country fall in line with Cuba and Nicaragua, where human rights are abused and democracy is a sham, if it were not for President Reagan.

Under Carter-Mondale the United States faced the utter humiliation of the hostage crisis in Iran. For 444 days U.S. citizens were held in captivity by Moslem fanatics, the U.S. seemingly impotent in protecting its people. Under President Reagan, the possibility of a similar situation arose in Grenada. Acting decisively, the President sent troops to rescue endangered American students and to restore security, peace, and democracy to a grateful nation which welcomed the Americans and liberators. The Reagan administration sent a strong signal to those who wish to expand their totalitarian systems. The United States is now willing to stand up for the free world.

Under Reagan-Bush, the U.S. has begun responding to the largest peace-time military build-up the world has ever seen. In a drive for nuclear superiority, the Soviet Union has bult massive quantities of new generation intermediate and inter-continental missiles. The U.S. defense build-up under President Reagan is a response to this. If this dangerous Soviet drive for nuclear superiority were to go unchecked, the theory of deterrence, which has kept us at peace thus far, would be undermined.

The Soviet system is a brutal political monstrosity, having absolutely no respect for human rights, and making no bones in both its words and actions about it ultimate goal of world domination. The Soviets only compromise when they feel it is in their interest to do so. As they see it, the promotion of Soviet world domination is their chief interest. Given this, it is clear that the president has embarked on the most logical course. By matching the Soviet drive, the uselessness of an arms race should become apparent to the Soviets, and only then will there be a possibility for meaningful arms reductions. The Soviets have placed their hopes in Walter Mondale, for if elected president, even before sitting down at the bargaining table, he has promised to scrap the B-1 bomber and the MX missile, without any Soviet concessions in return.

The re-election of President Reagan will send a firm signal to the rest of the world. We will stand by our friends and allies, oppose aggression, and promote our ideals throughout the world. Tomorrow, Americans with vision everywhere will be voting to re-elect the President. Think seriously about being one of them.

OPINION

The opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the university unless otherwise noted

Voting makes a difference

Tomorrow, every registered University of Massachusetts student will have a chance to make a difference--in the community, state and nation.

After a year and a half of media bombardment, Election Day is finally here. The candidates have been chosen after a long and painful process and hard work. They have done their part. Now it's up to us.

It's up to us to get out to the polling locations and vote. It's up to us to convince our friends and classmates to get out and vote. It's up to us to show that we students have a great deal at stake in these elections. And it's up to us to show that we care about the state we live in and the country our ancestors worked so hard to build.

Now it's our turn. As the next generation of leaders, what happens in the elections will affect us all. We can no longer use the excuse that it doesn't matter who wins, that their decisions won't affect us. We are now responsible adults who have to take responsibility for our state and country.

Voting tomorrow will be the best way to show our commitment. Don't let anyone tell you that one vote will not make a difference. It does. It has in the past and it will continue to do so in the future. Elections have been won by just one vote. And they've been lost for the same reason. Not only will your vote help choose our next government leaders, but will also show that the University and that students in general are a force to be reckoned with.

Even if you're not old enough to vote or are not registered, you can still make a difference. Go to the polling areas. Let those voting know who you support and why. Many people decide at the last moment who to vote for. You can make a difference.

For the sake of the future and for the sake of the world, don't stay in your room tomorrow. Forget your classes. Use every minute of tomorrow to help shape our future.

Vote.

"Are you better off than you were four years ago?" Ronald Reagan asked this at the end of his debate with Jimmy Carter in 1980, intimating that if he was elected president we would all be better off four years later. Well, those four years have come and gone, and now Mr. Reagan is looking for an answer. As Walter Mondale eloquently pointed out in their first debate, it depends on which stratum of American society one belongs to. The poor are worse off than they were four years ago, the middle class is about the same, and the rich are better off. Personally, my situation is worse than it was four years ago, but I cannot blame Ronald Reagan for rising phone bills and spiraling rents. However, when I cast my vote on Tuesday, I am not going to make my decision on the basis of how I am doing in 1984, or how my prospects look for 1987 or 1988. To do so would be to shirk my responsibility as a voting member of American society. There are more important issues then my personal economic standing.

The most important issue of this campaign, and unless the human race gives birth to an unexpected wave of enlightenment, the most important issue of the next several campaigns, is nuclear war. We now have a president who has talked about winning a "limited nuclear exchange," has poured billions of dollars into new nuclear weapons, has seen fit to only talk to the Russians while on the re-election campaign trail, and joked about bombing the Soviet Union. Instead of acting to inch the world away from the brink of the nuclear Armageddon that the two superpowers have brought us to, Mr. Reagan prefers to discuss it philosophically with the demagogues of the television puplit. While these chats may be enlightening for Mr. Reagan, they do absolutely nothing to make the world any safer for us, let alone our children. The cavalier attitude that Mr. Reagan treats this, and other presidential responsibilities, is appalling.

The Reagan plan for stacking the Supreme Court is another example of the danger of "four more years." While other presidents have attempted to stack the Court, Mr. Reagan has the historical distinction of wishing to base his choices for the bench on the religious views of the prospective justices. President Reagan has demonstrated his disdain for the Constitutional framers' belief that there must be a wall between church and state on numerous occasions, this is just the most dangerous manifestation to date. The far-reaching implications of this to the long-term vitality of democracy in the U.S. could be staggering.

Finally, there is the issue of honesty. The Reagan administration has a corruption track record that is reminiscent of the Nixon administration. Raymond Donovan is the first cabinet member in the history of the U.S. to be indicted while in public service. Did he resign? Of course not, he took a leave of absence. Are we to assume that he will be back on board if Reagan gets a second term? And we should not forget David Stockman, the economic whiz kid. Does anyone remember his interview at the beginning of Reagan's term, in which he stated that he kept feeding figures into the computer until he got the results that he wanted? Are we to assume that he has stopped that practice, now that he is out of the public eye? The disclosures that have come out of the White House in the last four years are most likely only the tip of the iceberg.

On election day, I am going to vote on the issues of this campaign, not on the images. Long after the polltakers and the television cameras have taken an interest in other topics of relevance to the Americans in the viewing audience, we will have to be dealing with the choice we make on Tuesday. The debate is over the future of America. It is a choice between equity and injustice, equality and prejudice, national interest and self-interest. But, most of all, it is a choice between war and peace. After all, no one is going to win the next world war.

The President remembers

Ronald Berutti

Too many people on campus feel that every move by President Reagan, and Vice-President George Bush has helped to create a national "malaise." (Do you remember that word?) I can no longer restrain myself from addressing a few remarks which are seen in print too often.

Does Mr. Reagan remember the term "equality"? Who was his first and only Supreme Court appointment? Who was President Reagan's appointment as United Nations ambassador? Perhaps you might remember who his recent appointments to the cabinet positions of Secretary of Health and Human Services, and Secretary of Transportation were? All of the positions noted above are filled by extremely qualified women. President Reagan does not appoint women as "tokens" to government posts, he has too much respect for women to do so.

Did Ronald Reagan forget the minorities? No, he did not, but the Democrats (including that Mondale fellow) have forgotten them in favor of party-politics. The President recently backed a Republican-sponsored program that would have given tax credits to private corporations if they put money into impoverished minority neighborhoods. This would have promoted industry and employment for people living in these areas. This measure, however, was voted down by the Democratic House of Representatives because it would have helped Reagan and other Republicans to gain minority support. It is also contrary to the handout policies which the Democrats like to implement.

What about "Reagan's deficit? Do you remember his proposed "balanced budget" amendment, which would keep the deficit from increasing? (Do you know who is against such a document? Here is a hint: it is the same man who was against every deficit-reducing bill in the past, and who now claims that if elected president, will reduce the deficit by taxing us).

Do you remember the Social Security program which was on the brink of bankruptcy? Do you remember the directon and leadership that the President displayed in restructuring Social Security so that it would last for our grandchildren? (Is there any leadership or direction left in the Democratic Party?)

Does Mr. Reagan remember appointing people such as Anne Burford, James Watt, Edwin Meese, and Raymond Donovan? Somebody actually asked that question. Yes, he is faithful to those he employs. Was the question implying that these people are guilty of crimes, or do these people just have different opinions than those of the questioner? (Surely I jest). Doesn't the "somewhat famous document we call the Constitution" say that you are innocent until proven guilty? (Do you remember John Zaccaro, and Bert Lance?)

Does Reagan remember double-digit unemployment? Do you remember the statistic of today which says that more people are employed in this country than ever before? Do you remember that the medium-income family has $4,000 more purchasing power than it would have had with the inflation and tax rates of 1980? President Reagan knows all of this. He also remembers double-digit inflation, and interest rates which peaked at 21.5 percent (Do you want to forget the Carter-Mondale administration?)

It has also been asked if Ronald Reagan remembers Thomas Dewey. Do you remember George McGovern?

Ronald Berutti is a UMass student.

Letters to the Editor

Don't throw in the towel

Andrew Paven's Oct. 23 editorial rubbed me wrong. He said something that I've heard too many times these last few weeks. He said Mondale's the better man; Reagan's going to win. Maybe he's even right, but that's for Nov. 6 to tell, not Oct. 23.

This is "cutting your losses" before you've lost anything (i.e. before the fight is over). For example, the Convention Boycott, organized by N.O.W. in a "last ditch" effort to save E.R.A. Enough organizations complied with the call to cost the unratified states 60 million convention dollars in the first year. But the next year feminists began saying E.R.A. was a lost cause. And then E.R.A. died.

Yet who am I to tell anti-Reaganites about the millions of uncommited voters waiting to be swayed and to help snatch our future from the gaping jaws of the Reagan nightmare? It took me 8 days to write this--and I wasn't busy. I don't care; not like Americans used to in the good old Reagan movie days. Anybody caught going down with the ship today is likely to get lynched as well.

No, I don't care and you don't care; and I don't care about that either. I'm not depressed. However, I will be spending 1988 in France, if Reagan hasn't made it a U.S. province by then.

Fluoridate Amherst water?

Voters to settle controversial health issue

By TOM MIDDLETON
Collegian Staff

Amherst voters will decide by referendum on Tuesday whether or not their water will be fluoridated. Proponents of fluoride claim that it prevents tooth decay, while many residents oppose adding any more chemicals to drinking water.

On May 24, the Amherst Health Department voted unanimously to add fluoride to the town's water after a feasibility study by the State Health Department recommended the move.

Town residents opposing fluoridation submitted a petition on Aug. 28 to have the issue settled by referendum. The Town Clerk's office validated the more than 1,618 signatures required for the referendum.

Opponents of fluoridation argue that it can cause mottling of teeth, liver damage and other unhealthful side effects. Opponents also argue that it is mass medication without consent of the individual citizen.

According to a statement released by the Amherst Board of Health, water fluoridation has proven to be the most effective method of preventing tooth decay. The statement adds that more than 123 million Americans are receiving fluoridation in their water.

Fluoridation is supported by virtually every health organization in Massachusetts and the United States, including the World Health Organization, according to the statement.

The State Health Department's feasibility study estimates that fluoridation would cost each Amherst resident 45 cents per year.

The ballot:

10 choices, including referendum, to be made

By TOM MIDDLETON
Collegian Staff

Amherst voters will make 10 choices when they cast their ballots tomorrow, including whether or not to fluoridate Amherst water and who their elected officials will be.

At the top of the ballot will be the choice for president and vice president of the United States. It is a three-way race between Republican incumbents Ronald Reagan and George Bush, Democratic challengers Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro and Massachusetts Independent Alliance candidates Dennis Serrette and Nancy Ross.

The race for the U.S. Senate seat vacated by Paul Tsongas due to illness is between Democratic Lt. Gov. John Kerry and Republican businessman Ray Shamie.

Incumbent Silvio Conte is running against Smith College graduate Mary Wentworth for the First Congressional District seat in the U.S. House of Representatives.

On the ballot in the race for the state House of Representatives is incumbent James Collins (D-Amherst) and Mary Ann Foley, a Granby Democrat.

County Commissioner Paul Dineen (D) is running for re-election against Pat Lewis Sackrey (D).

Running for office unopposed are: State Senator John Olver (D), State Treasurer William F. O'Connor (D), Registrar of Probate Robert Czelusniak (D) and Councillor Edward O'Brian (D), all of whom are running for re-election. Norma June Thibodo (D) is running for the office of Clerk of Courts.

Polls show Reagan leading; Mondale says 'Don't give up'

By DAVID ESPO
Associated Press Writer

A confident Ronald Reagan, campaigning to the "final whistle," invaded Walter F. Mondale's home turf of Minnesota yesterday in a drive for a 50-state sweep in Tuesday's election, while Mondale urged supporters, "don't despair, don't give up" despite polls pointing to a Republican landslide.

Campaigning from a black Baptist pulpit in Memphis, Tenn., the Democratic challenger catalogued the president's cuts in the welfare, school lunch and food stamp programs and said, "We've got more people in poverty than at any time in the last 20 years."

Reagan, who decided at the last minute to campaign in Minnesota, said he would bar tax increases unless someone proved there was "some excuse for doing such a thing." That seemed slightly softer than Saturday's statement that taxes would go up in a second term "over my dead body."

With the verdict of 125 million registered voters only 48 hours away, Reagan's lead in the public opinion polls was impressive.

The Washington Post-ABC News poll put it at 57 percent to 39 percent, with 4 percent undecided, and said the Reagan-Bush ticket appeared to be ahead in 47 of the 50 states. An Associated Press survey gave Reagan the lead in 49 states, and said Mondale and running mate Geraldine Ferraro were narrowly ahead in his home state while leading solidly only in the District of Columbia.

While Mondale and Ferraro were virtually the only ones forecasting a Democratic victory, late polls pointed to gains for the underdog Democrats.

A survey by pollster Louis Harris for National Public Radio indicated a Reagan lead of 55-43, a decline of 4 percentage points from his margin two days earlier.

Mondale left the industrial states of the Midwest behind and was working his way through Tennessee and Texas, hoping to spur support from blacks and Hispanics, before spending the night in Reagan's home state of California.

The president's nighttime destination was California as well, but he criss-crossed the Midwest on the final Sunday of the campaign looking to help himself and GOP congressional candidates.

Reagan refused to flatly rule out eliminating tax deductions for state and local income taxes. Nor would he rule out the possibility of taxing unemployment benefits and workers compensation benefits and workers compensation benefits, all proposals that have surfaced in recent days from Treasury Department officials looking for recommendations to forward to Secretary Donald Regan.

Mondaly says taxes will have to go up after the election to reduce the federal budget deficit, no matter who is elected, but Reagan has always said he has no plans for a tax increase.

Tough U.S. Senate campaign ending with Kerry ahead

By JAMES SIMON
Associated Press Writer

BOSTON AP — Democrat John Kerry and Republican Ray Shamie fought campaign fatigue instead of each other as they continued to hunt for enough votes to bring them victory in the final hours of their long U.S. Senate campaign.

Kerry, battling a raspy cough, and Shamie appeared weary Sunday as they continued to campaign in various parts of the state. The concentrated on their usual themes Shamie's call for limited government, Kerry's support for Democratic social programs and avoided the personal attacks that have marked the campaign.

Kerry planned a final statewide series of appearances today with Sen. Edward M. Kennedy while Shamie will be aided by the man he beat in the GOP Senate primary, Elliot Richardson, in a final swing through the Greater Boston area.

Both Kerry and Shamie said they planned to ignore recent polls that showed the Democrat with a comfortable lead in the race.

A new Boston Herald survey, conducted after back-to-back visits by President Reagan and Democrat Walter Mondale to the state last week indicated Kerry had increased his lead over Shamie to 57-39 percent, up from 11 points in a survey taken before the visits.

Kerry, worried about his troops becoming overconfident, said he did not consider the race to be over.

"Absolutely not. I think it's closer than that, personally," he said. "I have said throughout this race since January that I have never placed that much stock in the polls. . . I have never ever felt that any vote can be taken for granted. I will be working until Tuesday night at 8 p.m."

Shamie said pollsters repeatedly had been wrong in trying to predict how well he would do in election campaigns.

The Walpole Republican said he did better in losing to Sen. Edward M. Kennedy in the 1982 campaign than polls predicted. This year, he said he won the 1984 GOP Senate primary even though polls showed rival Elliot Richardson ahead.

"When the pollsters now say Mr. Kerry is ahead, I don't worry about that because historically I'm always behind," said Shamie, who believes the race is a dead heat.

Almost 1,000 Kerry supporters packed a Fall River restaurant banquet room for the noontime rally. As a Dixieland band played "Happy Days Are Here Again," the crowd showed a warmth toward Kerry that often is lacking at the Democrat's events.

Kerry promised to go to Washington and help clean up the poisonous PCBs in New Bedford harbor and expand foreign trade opportunities for the area's textile mills. He also vowed to fight any cuts in Social Security and Medicaid while trying to restore social programs cut by President Reagan.

"We have not lost our conscience and we will not ratify the notion that selfishness is going to be made fashionable in the United States of America," said Kerry.

At his New Bedford stop, Shamie returned to the themes that he began the campaign with — the need to reduce government spending, hold the line on taxes and encourage small businessmen to expand their operations and generate new jobs.

"Who knows more about creating jobs - John Kerry or Ray Shamie," asked Shamie, a millionaire owner of two high tech companies. He got a strong response from a small but loyal band of followers at a news conference.

Kerry's plan to reduce military spending by $200 million over three years would lead to "emasculating the military," the Republican said, and would have a disastrous impact on the Massachusetts economy in which 30,000 jobs could be lost.

Shamie says he is confident of receiving enough votes from Bay State Democrats and independents to outweigh any losses among Republicans.

Incumbent Conte's record like Reagan's, Wentworth claims

By REBECCA THATCHER
Collegian Staff

Amherst resident and community activist Mary Wentworth wants what Silvio Conte of Pittsfield has held for the past 26 years – the First Congressional District seat in the U.S. House of Representatives.

Throughout the campaign Wentworth, a Democrat, has charged that Conte, a Republican, is a friend of the Reagan administration and has not accurately represented the progressive politics of Western Massachusetts.

"A vote for me is like taking out insurance," Wentworth said yesterday. "Having a progressive Democrat and a woman in the first Congressional seat will provide that much more of an obstacle to Reagan's programs if he is re-elected or it will provide that much more of a lift to Mondale and Ferraro if they get in."

Conte was not available for comment, but his staff workers deny that claim, asserting that Conte is "an independent guy who votes his conscience."

Conte is the ranking Republican on the House Appropriations Committee. He is also on transportation, education and labor appropriations subcommittees.

Wentworth said the press simply reports what Conte says and never compares his statements with his actual record.

"He voted to cut financial aid, he voted to cut higher education grants, and he voted to end social security benefits that students get if a parent who died was on social security," Wentworth said.

Wentworth, who worked at the UMass Everywoman's Center as the coordinator of the poor women's task force and is founding member of the Massachusetts Tenants Organization, said she is a feminist who is pro choice on abortion and supportive of the Equal Rights Amendment.

Conte voted in opposition to Medicaid funding of abortions, according to his staff member Pat Larkin. He was an original sponsor of the Equal Rights Amendment.

Wentworth said party regulars consider her a "sacrificial lamb."

Conte, a veteran of World War II, attended Boston College and Boston Law School. Wentworth graduated from Smith College and has been involved in many activist causes including a fact-finding delegation to Nicaragua and Honduras last year.

Republican Foley challenges Rep. Collins' re-election bid

By JOHN O'CONNELL
Collegian Staff

The race for the Massachusetts Legislature Third Hampshire District seat now held by Jim Collins (D-Amherst) has been low key so far, with both candidates speaking to small area groups and leafleting local residents.

Collins, seeking a seventh two-year term in the Legislature, is being challenged by Republican Mary Ann Foley of Granby. The district includes Amherst, Belchertown, Pelham and Granby.

Collins, 38, is House chairman of the Joint Committee on Education. He said his two priorities for a seventh term are "making sure the University continues to become stronger each year, in terms of state aid," and working for passage of an education reform package he designed with Senate education committee Chairman Gerald D'Amico (D-Worcester).

A 1968 graduate of UMass, Collins said the University "is the main economic underpinning for the entire area." The University employs more than 5,000 people and its budget is the area's "prime economic building block," he said.

Collins said he finds "a commonality of interests" between local residents and the University.

By working to stop the 15 percent tuition increase proposed by the Board of Regents and by securing strong local aid money from the state, Collins said he has served both constituencies in the State House.

Foley, 36, serves on the Granby Zoning Board of Appeals and before that served two years on the town planning board. She said she decided to run for the Legislature because "after researching the past four years of Rep. Collins' voting record...I just got angry."

"He's not serving the people of the area," she said.

Foley said she would set up home offices in all four towns and at the University if she is elected. And a student will work with her one day a week to make sure student problems are addressed in the State House, she said.

Foley said she is also interested in correcting some of the problems in child care systems, and said she would concentrate on issues such as wife and child abuse and elderly affairs if elected. She serves on the Granby Councilon Aging and does volunteer work with a drug and alcohol abuse program for Granby teenagers.

UM Democrats and Republicans have their say

By RICHARD MARTIN
Collegian Staff

Like the unknown fighters on the undercards of a heavyweight title bout, they've been going toe-to-toe for the past two weeks. No dancing. No pulling punches. At least Reagan and Mondale were able to agree to two debates.

University Democrats President Kevin Sweeney and University Republicans President Stephen Erickson will meet at 6 p.m. today on radio station WMUA to discuss the issues of the 1984 presidential campaign.

Over the past two weeks Sweeney and Erickson have been arguing on the editorial pages of the Collegian about why their two groups haven't been able to get together and debate. A closer look shows that the two disagree on more than just the proper format for a debate.

Republicans reject 'radical' politics

Erickson, 20, is an art history major from Wellesley. He is one of the club's original 15 founding members in October 1983, and says that there are now 150 members paying $3 yearly dues. There are another 240 unofficial members. The club grew out of discontent with the traditional modes of political discussion at UMass.

"We're working and campaigning on a campus that's kind of different. We consider this campus not just liberal, but radical in the context of American politics in general. By that I'm not referring to the political beliefs of the typical student, but organizations on campus like the Radical Student Union, the editorial page of the Collegian, and the student senate," Erickson said.

Erickson said the club is backing Ronald Reagan because the president has carried out his promises to reduce inflation, interest rates, and unemployment, along with upgrading the military. The UMass Republicans don't embrace the ultra-conservative National platform, however.

Erickson said, "Our own platform rejects socialism as unfair, and inefficient. It embraces capitalism and free enterprise, and says that the best way to maintain peace is through a deterrent. Socially, we recognize the importance of religion and the family. We did not adopt the entire Republican national platform because something like putting in school prayer would alienate a lot of people. Our goal is to appeal to a broad sector of people. Besides, platforms aren't historically binding."

Democrats support party platform

Sweeney, 19, is an English major from Westfield. He's been leader of the University Democrats since they formed six weeks ago. He gave a rousing warmup speech at the Ferraro rally, after which Rep. Ray Jordan called him "a born politician."

Sweeney said there are about 60 UMass Democrats paying $2 dues, but that there about another 150 unofficial members working in the campaign.

Sweeney said that straw polls of the campus by his group show that the majority of students are Democrats, and that their group is representative of the campus as a whole.

He said the main reason the Democrats and Republicans have not debated is that the Republicans won't address the issues of their platform.

"They are afraid of their own platform, at least that's the sense I get. They say that they are supportive of the president and the party but they don't even agree with what the party has to say. They wanted to have team debating, which was fine with us, but by talking with wide open format, that would reduce the debate to rhetoric and lack of substance (that was) in the presidential debates," Sweeney said.

"We can support the Democratic party platform completely across the board. We didn't see any need for moderation. We were happy because it's an excellent document and agree with it on the issues—the nuclear freeze, ERA, deficits," he said.

Sweeney said his group supports Walter Mondale because he represents a break from self-interest. He said that Mondale represents all types of people and "We are stronger as a nation of diversity rather than as a nation of sameness."

Sweeney compared the federal deficit and economic recovery to that facing the country in 1929, when there was an economic boom under Herbert Hoover that was followed by the Great Depression.

"Mondale represents the best choice for the future for us and our children. He's going to make the difference when he sits down at the negotiating table with the Soviets. It will be a scary decade if we don't have a mutual, verifiable nuclear freeze now," Sweeney said.

Reception to be held to view election returns

UMass faculty and students are invited to watch television coverage of the presidential election, Tuesday night from 8 p.m. to 11 p.m. in the main lounge of Memorial Hall. Beer, wine and food will be served, according to Jon Hite, director of alumni affairs.

The event will be sponsored by the Office of Alumni Affairs and the Collegian.

Paid Political Announcement

An Appeal to the Heart and to Common Sense

Ask Not for Whom the Bell Tolls--

Can a person of conscience and humanity--a person who loves this country--endorse the Reagan policies in the Caribbean and Central America?

We stand condemned by the overwhelming majority of the world's nations for our lawless occupation of Grenada.

The World Court ruled against the U.S. 15-0 for endangering access to Nicaragua's ports and 14-1 for our military aggression against the people of Nicaragua.

Article 2 (4) of the UN Charter

"All members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat of force or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Purposes of the United Nations."

U.S. Lawlessness

"Throughout the 20th century, the U.S. Government has routinely concocted evanescent threats to the lives and property of U.S. nationals as pretexts to justify armed intervention into sister American states.

"The Reagan administration has not established by means of clear and convincing evidence that there did exist an immediate treat to the safety of U.S. citizens in Grenada. Even then, such a threat could have justified only a limited military operation along the lines of the Israeli raid at Entebbe for the sole purpose of evacuating the major concentration of U.S. nationals at the medical college.

". . .the only consequence can be an increasing degree of international violence, chaos and anarchy. International lawlessness in Grenada will return to haunt the future of American foreign policy around the world. Yet right now the Reagan administration seems to be planning an identical fate for the Sandinista Government of Nicaragua."

--From a statement by a group of international law authorities in the American Journal of International Law, Vol. 78, No. 1: Francis A. Boyle, U. of Illinois; Abram Chayes and C. Clyde Ferguson, Jr., Harvard; Isaak Dore, St. Louis U.; Richard Falk, Princeton; Martin Feinrider, Nova Law Center; J. David Fine and Keith Nunes, Loyola U. in New Orleans, and Burns Weston, U. of Iowa.

Inhumanity of U.S. Policy

"No description of hell touches the bestiality of what is happening to the people of El Salvador. Not a handful of people; thousands of people. It is not sentimental to face squarely the consequences of human brutality. It is the necessary reality for those who order, allow, and do it and those who bankroll and apologize for it."

--Patricia Derian, Assistant Secreatary of State for Human Rights under President Carter, after her participation in a visit to El Salvador with the Commission on U.S.-Central American Relations, headed by former Amabassador Robert E. White.

Peace, not War

"Peacemaking is not an optional commitment. It is a requirement of our faith."

--American Roman Catholic bishop's pastoral letter calling for a halt to the production, testing and deployment of nuclear weapons.

It Tolls for Thee

War preparation under Reagan is costing us dearly in domestic programs. It is piling up a gigantic national debt that imperils future generations. For instance

Reduction in federal funding for education at all levels.

Tens of billions of dollars cut from Social Security, Medicare, and Medicaid.

Tens of billions of dollars and 270,000 elderly severed from Medicaid benefits. 450,000 others ruthlessly and illegally cut from Social Security disability rolls.

Under Reagan, federal support for child care for working parents was initially cut 21%. Three million fewer are receiving school lunches.

Twenty states showed increased death rates for infants in the Reagan recession year of 1982, a time when unemployment hit 10.6% (worst since the 1930's).

We are No. 1 in military spending, but No. 17 in keeping infants alive in the first year of life.

A remarkable Seagull

by CHRISTINE MARINI

The Seagull
Wednesday, October 31
Curtain Theater

The UMass Department of Theater's production of Anton Chekhov's The Seagull was consistently entertaining as well as thought-provoking. For three hours the tiny Curtain Theater absorbed the tosca and languor of a Russian country-estate party as the characters question the meanings of success, happiness, fame, and love.

It is a credit to both the playwright and the Department of Theater that this production (despite contemporary turn-of-the-century costumes and furnishings) was strikingly modern in its impact. The problems Chekhov's characters face--warped family dynamics, misdirected passion, personal regrets--have lost none of their freshness in the intervening century.

Director Richard Trovsdell brought this complex work to life with skill and wit. The sets and lighting (designed by Daniel Gray and Robert Shakespeare respectively) fulfilled the many purposes required without distracting. The lighting in the play-within-a-play was particularly effectual. The cast was uniformly excellent. Each player helped maintain the balance between seriousness and frivolity upon which this play relies.

Outstanding performances were given by many. Oliver Wadsworth credibly interpreted the difficult role of Konstantin Gavrilovich. David Alun Spencer's Dr. Dorn was wonderfully mocking and sincere by turns. Letitia Cresap Ord, playing the actress Irina Nikolaevna, displayed a wide range of emotions with the style and power of a ture actress--one who is never "off stage." Boris Alekseevich Trigorin, the famous novelist, as played by Brian Crow, was remarkable. One was aware of his presence on stage long before he was introduced. Crow's love-hate scene with Ord's Irina at the beginning of Act II was electrifying. Together these players and the rest joined to present a powerful production of a great play.

One awkward moment occured: the device used to convey the two-year pause in the action between the first two scenes in Act II was mock-solemn and unintentionally amusing. But the absorbing performances before and after this interlude lessened its (unpleasant) impact.

The Seagull, unfortunately, had a short run. Those who missed it are urged to see the Department of Theater's productions later this semester of Howard Brenton's Sore Throats and Shakespear's A Midsummer Night's Dream.

Jeanne Collins as Nina and Letitia Ord as Irina in the Department of Theater's production of Chekhov's The Seagull.

Controversial student art

Bridget Galway
at the Wheeler Art Gallery

By BRADFORD VERTER
Collegian Staff

UMass Art student Bridget Galway's controversial show at the Wheeler Art Gallery opened on Nov. 1st to a receptive audience.

Her ink drawings, the "erotica" series, caused some consternation amongst the Wheeler Gallery administration. They questioned what was appropriate for a college audience.

Their fears, however, seem to be unfounded as no one has complained. One viewer commented, "I don't find it offensive at all. In fact, I kinda like it".

With self-proclaimed roots evident in Erte, Matisse and Gaughan, Galway's work struck the audience differently. "I like her use of color," said one viewer, while another contradicted: "The black and white drawings are definitely better."

Having returned to school as a freshman at age 29, Galway seeks to learn the discipline and patience she feels she needs. "If I start something I either finish it (then and there), or I never finish it", she said.

"Having (my son) Balke was the motivation to get serious about my life," she said.

Galway's show remains open until Nov. 7th.

came after a Jim Tandler punt of 29 yards that gave UConn the ball at their own 47.

The Huskies then took a 21-10 advantage as DuBose took off from his 46 and went the distance to the end zone with 5:57 to go in the game.

But the gutty Minutemen offense refused to fold. Simeone completed passes of 5, 19, and 17 yards before finding Brother Bob again with a highlight film perfect 24 yard pass to the left corner of the end zone with 3:48 to go. The drive covered 79 yards in eight plays in just 2:08. The conversion pass was picked off.

But UConn coach Tom Jackson, 2-0 against UMass, called on DuBose and eight times the senior carried it, chewing up the final 2:48 seconds after UMass' onside kick. UConn got as close as the UMass one yard line but mercifully let the clock run out.

In the game, UConn ran up 504 yards of total offense. They ran 77 plays for an average of 6.5 yards. UMass has 391 yards of offense, but again mistakes close to the goal line hurt the Minutemen. UMass was 5 of 14 in third down conversions and 0 for 2 on fourth and ones.

coach Susanna Kaplan said. "In the second half, we really took it to them. It was a matter of taking every opportunity we could."

The game went into two 15 minute overtimes and the Minuteman pressure increased. Seta sent a shot off the post from 15 yards out and about four passes later Carolyn Micheel lofted a rocket from 25 yards out, with 2:10 gone in the first OT, into the left corner for the 2-1 UMass lead.

"We wanted to win," Micheel said," and we had to be more aggressive. We controlled to first half but the second half they kind of took it to us."

In the first and second overtimes, the UMass pressure never subsided and UMass' leading scorer Jolie DePauw scored her first playoff goal with 3:05 to go in the 2nd OT for the 3-1 lead.

BC's Karyn Hesse sent a shot off the hands of Paul into the net with one minute to go to narrow the score to 3-2 but the Minutemen killed the clock to set up next weekend's meeting with Harvard, a 2-1 winner over Vermont Saturday.

"This was a tough game to play," Banda said. "We made some mistakes that could be costly but good teams should be able to win even with mistakes."

Cathy Spence, in her first start of the year, took a beautiful backwards head ball from Monica Seta and challenged Eagle goalie Brophy one-on-one and slammed the ball into the net for the 1-0 UMass lead with 8:00 gone in the first half.

"Cathy is improving every game," Banda said. "I'd rather not have her start. She can kill you off the bench."

But the lead didn't stand up against an Eagle team that UMass had pummeled a week earlier, 5-0.

"They had a very veteran team and as good as we are we're still a young team," Banda said. Seven freshmen and a sophomore started on UMass' 11-person lineup Saturday.

The game was an intense one in the latter stages of the second half and in overtime. As a result, three UMass players, Debbie Belking (who had a stellar game at back), Monica Seta and Kristen Bowsher all went down with leg cramps. Jamie Watson turned an ankle but Banda expected her back next week.

"They grow tough around here," Banda said. "Watson's an athlete. She'll play on one leg."

The UMass-Harvard NCAA quarter-final match will be played in Amherst either next Saturday or Sunday, said Banda. The Crimson took a 1-0 decision from UMass earlier this year. The UMass-Harvard winner goes to the Final Four and matchup with either top-seeded Brown or UConn.

Field hockey loses in season finale

UConn spoils bid for home field advantage, first round bye in playoffs

By ED HAYWARD
Collegian Staff

Suffering from an uncharacteristic mid-game collapse, the University of Massachusetts field hockey team surrendered the final game of their season 2-1 to the University of Connecticut Saturday.

"It looked like there were four different teams on the field," said UMass coach Pam Hixon. "We put a different team on the field in the second half and so did UConn.

"Before the game our goal was to be consistant, control the tempo of play and deny our opponents the ball. We did all that in the first half--we controlled the tempo, dominated their territory and kept them out," Hixon said.

With UMass controlling the midfield game they were able to create numerous scoring opportunities in the first half. However, as expected, Minuteman forwards encountered stiff opposition from UConn's All-America goalie Terry Kicks.

UMass got off 17 shots in the first period 12 of which were saved by Kicks. Five went wide. UConn could only manage eight shots in the first half. UMass goalie Lynn Carlson saved five.

In the second half UMass came out strong, playing as they had in the preceeding period. Minuteman forward Christing Kocot put the first point on the board at 24.21 of the half. The goal was unassisted. But the goal was the last sign of success to be seen from UMass for the afternoon as their dominance of the contest disintegrated.

"After the score we had a mental let-down," Hixon said. "I think we were just trying to hold on for the victory."

"The goal seemed to take the wind out of our sails. Once we scored we couldn't play our game and then UConn took control. We panicked. We gave them opportunities and took the pressure off of UConn and put it on ourselves. Usually when you score you like to think you're in control. But we didn't stay in control; we didn't continue to do the jobs we needed to," Hixon said.

With UMass failing to maintain superiority in the contest UConn took advantage. With ten minutes to play in the game UConn got its first goal. Four minutes later UConn scored the game winner. In the half UConn outshot UMass 13 to either. Carlson saved nine shots (two went wide) while Kicks saved five UMass shots.

"We just didn't take charge when we were in charge," Hixon said. "We consistently gave the ball back to UConn and you cannot do that with them. They are a dangerous team; they have speed and skill and it was going to take a good effort to beat them."

Hixon did praise the play of her deep defenders, Carlson and sweeper Karissa Niehoff.

"Lynn played well and Karissa probably played the best game she has played for us all year. Of all the players out there they were the most consistent," said Hixon.

The Minutemen finished the regular season with a 13-4 record. While they are assured of a playoff position, chances of being seeded (given to the top teams) are slim. UMass was ranked fifth prior to their game against the seventh ranked Huskies.

On the loss of the chance to be seeded, thus receiving a first round bye Hixon said, "It's made our job more difficult. I'm not saying it (winning the NCAA's) cannot be done, it's just going to be more tedious."

Men's soccer shutout by Maine at home

Minutemen fail to capitalize

By SCOTT HOOD
Collegian Staff

They had a chance. But no more.

All dreams of advancing to post season action vanished yesterday for the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team as they outplayed and outshot the University of Maine on Boyden Field, but were blanked, 2-0.

As the number four ranked team in New England, the Minutemen, with victories over the Black Bears and Harvard this Tuesday could conceivably have been selected to represent the New England region in the NCAA tournament. But thanks to stellar goaltending by Maine's Jeff Spring, who even managed to score a goal on a penalty kick yesterday, UMass is looking to play the role of spoiler on Tuesday against the crimson.

Twice in the first half yesterday did Main penetrate as far as the UMass penalty box. And both times they scored. The first goal came 18 minutes into the game when John Tierney booted a seemingly harmless ball toward the UMass net and Minutemen goalie Don Donahue stepped out to snare the ball. However, Donahue misjudged the shot and the ball ended up in the lower left corner.

"The ball came through a screen of players and they had a forward running on and I anticipated the head, which I shouldn't have, and the ball went by my food," Donahue said.

The second goal, scored with three minutes left in the first half, came off a penalty kick by Springs after a UMass defender had stopped a sure Maine goal with his hand moments earlier when Donahue dropped a cross from a Black Bear corner kick.

"We made two mistakes and it ended up costing us the game," UMass coach Jeff Gettler said. "We never should have been in this situation. We can't afford to make mistakes like that. Psychologically it affects the whole team."

UMass never lacked an opportunity to score, but Springs denied the relentless Minutemen like a brick wall. In a two minute span shortly before Maine's second goal, Springs made three superb saves off UM corner kicks. Another time, the UMass players actually started to throw their hands up in celebration of a goal, but Springs, at the last second, deflected the ball just past the left post.

In the second half, Springs denied Kurt Manal early on, but saved his best for last, when at the 12-minute mark, he dove to stop a Tom Giordano shot from point-blank range. In other instances, the UM shooters simply misfired. With 8:34 remaining, the Minutemen had an indirect kick in front of the Black Bear goal after Springs was called for taking too many steps after catching a shot. However, Manal drilled a left-footed shot wide left. With three minutes remaining, John Shannon had a shot in the front of the net, but kicked the ball over the goal.

"In the second half, I don't know if we could have done more offensively," Gettler said. "Everybody had chances, but we just didn't finish. That's just going to happen sometimes."

The game yesterday was the final home game for UMass this season and marked the last appearances of fullbacks Mike Runeare and Mike Rudd on Boyden Field. On Tuesday, the Minutemen travel to Cambridge to take on Harvard and conclude the season on Saturday at Hartwick.

UConn spoils Homecoming, 21-16

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

Rennie Benn, Paul Lewis, Greg Grooms, Marty Horn, Lance Theobald and Peter Muldoon.

To this list of players that have set school records while against the University of Massachusetts this season, add the lesser-known but just as capable Gary DuBose.

DuBose, whose previous claim to distinction was having a younger brother play for Nebraska, rambled for 245 yards to help the University of Connecticut snap a four game losing streak and stretch UMass' o five with a 21-16 dismantling of the Minutemen at the newly-named Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium Saturday.

"What do I think we did well? We tried pretty hard," UMass head coach Bob Stull said after the game.

The Minutemen, who haven't won since beating Northeastern on September 29, are in danger of recording their first winless Yankee Conference season since 1957. Since 1982, UMass is 5-8 in the league after enjoying a 25-5 dominance from 76 to 81. They are now 2-7.

The Homecoming day crowd of 13,031 at the stadium, renamed for the late UMass athletic director before the game, saw UMass jump ahead 3-0 as consistent George Papoutsidis booted a 21-yard field goal with 20 seconds to go in the first quarter.

The score capped an 87 yard, 17 play drive that saw UMass start at the UConn 10 and march to a first and goal situation at the five on the strength of George Barnwell's running (seven carries for 56 yards including a 28 yard jaunt).

But at the goal line, the Minutemen again failed. Barnwell took a handoff left for no gain, fullback Frank Fay tried the middle for no gain, and quarterback Jim Simeone (12 for 25, 153 yards) failed to connect with Fay on third down. Out came Papoutsidis and the golden Greek gave UMass a 3-0 advantage.

In the second period, UConn, now 3-5 put together an ugly but effective drive that resulted in a Chris Riley to Brian McGillicuddy 39 yard scoring pass for a 7-3 lead that held up through the half.

In the second period, UMass missed a key fourth and one from the Husky 31 as Simeone couldn't get a yard on a plunge. The go-ahead TD for UConn came 10 plays later after two Huskie penalties, two incomplete passes and two carries for losses.

The second half belonged to DuBose. The 6-0, 185 pounder had gained a total of 231 yards all season for UConn. His longest had been 29 yartis; the injured Billy Parks had been the glory man.

DuBose, who had been listed as questionable for the game with cracked ribs, ran for 168 second half yards. He led the nation in rushing Saturday.

"Yea, I had a good day, but the offensive line opened the holes for me," DuBose said. "My ribs hurt a little but a win takes a lot of the pain away."

Yet despite DuBose, UMass took a 10-7 lead with 4:34 to go in the third quarter. After Riley was sacked by nose guard Peter Tracy at his own 49, the sophomore QB coughed up the ball to a waiting Dave Cavanaugh.

Simeone and company took over from there, Barnwell carried twice for a first down (He had an overshadowed 145 yards rushing) and Simeone hit his brother Bob with a 22 yarder to the UConn seven.

From there the junior quarterback faked a pitch and went right unmolested to make it 10-7 after Papoutsidis booted the PAT.

UConn took the lead for good in the final period as Riley found Scott Jennkins at the UMass ten and the sophomore split end carried it in for a 14-10 advantage. The play

Women's soccer advances by nipping BC in OT

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team did accomplish a few of their pre-game goals in Saturday's first round NCAA playoff game at Boyden Field.

The fourth-seeded Minutemen did score the first goal of the game. They did it early, eight minutes after the opening whistle. However, UMass let the 11th ranked Eagle convert on one of their two shots in the second half and ended up having to go to overtime to take a 3-2 win.

UMass, 13-22, lost their killer instinct in the second half. "People were just getting hammered. We were getting tired," senior co-captain Lori Stukes said.

Thus, when Lynne Collins took a pass from Jennifer Fitzpatrick with 16:20 to go in regulation and snuck it past UMass goalie Jeanne Paul, it tied up the score at 1-1.

UMass, who outshot the Eagles 26-7, missed senior All-American Chris Taggart on the forward line. Taggart and her sister Ellen had to miss the game due to personal reasons.

"We missed Chris," coach Kalekeni Banda said. "We needed the maturity."

The Eagles goal fired up the UMass attack and the Minutemen peppered BC goalie Kathy Brophy with shots in the last 15 minutes, but the senior goalie was coming up with her best game of the season.

"We pretty much stuck to our game plan and contained them in the first half," BC

Who's going to argue that Lite tastes great? Not me

Peter Abraham

Who was the most impressive football player at the newly-named McGuirk Alumni Stadium on Saturday?

UConn tailback Gary DuBose maybe? UMass linebacker Dave Cavanaugh? Perhaps Minuteman nose guard Peter Tracy?

Strong cases could be made for all three, but one person stood, literally, head and shoulders above all three.

At 6-7, 270 pounds former Oakland Raider defensive end Ben Davidson turned more than a few heads as he climbed the stairs to the pressbox at the stadium during halftime on Saturday.

Known recently for his Lite Beer from Miller commercials (in 1975 he arm-wrestled a truck of a man at a bar and after barely straining to beat his opponent, he growls "next!"), Davidson is better known for crushing NFL quarterbacks during his reign of terror in the 60's.

Now, he makes $2,000 a weekend to travel around the country promoting Lite Beer. All of the Lite beer all-stars are required to make two appearances a year; Davidson makes over 40.

"Name me a better job than what I'm doing," Davidson said. "I get to meet a lot of people, visit old friends (ex-Raider linebacker Bill Budness got a visit in his Deerfield home by Davidson on Saturday) and drink beer, it's great."

Still trim after his retirement, Davidson admitted he started looking for something to do before he quit crunching quarterbacks.

"I wanted to travel and make money, this is it," the massive Davidson said. "It's a hell of a time."

Despite being subjected to numerous interviews (he was on WMUA) a lot of basic questions ("I liked hitting all quarterbacks, I didn't have a favorite.") and living in a different hotel every night, Davidson still finds time to write personal autographs (To Pet, thanks for the great questions, good luck, Ben Davidson) and shake the hands of lower-level administrators to quiver in fear when he approaches and retain a good sense of humor.

"I haven't really watched the game too much," admitted Davidson during the intermission when UMass held a soon-to-fold lead. "But I like UMass because coach Stull coached at my school (Washington) and I like the way the teams hit."

Davidson visits colleges, bars (he was at Changes), and other places across the nation to promote Lite Beer (he's for the Less Filling side in case you're wondering).

"It's the greatest thing to get together with all the famous athletes during the taping of the commercials," Davidson said. "Even Rodney."

He's as big as you would expect in person. His hands are big enough to engulf the pictures he autographs.

And he's with little doubt the last person I'd think of insulting, he could twist your head like a doorknob.

"Nah, I never held any grudges against sportswriters," said Gentle Ben.

And I'm not the first, right Mr. Davidson?

FOOTBALL NOTES: Next week's opponent, Delaware, crushed a hapless Morgan State 76, yes that's 76, to zip. BU coach Rick Taylor said last week that every team should have a Morgan State on its schedule. Well, we have Ball State.

And finally, where have you gone Jo Jo White?

Election 1984: Our Time Has Come

by Segun Eubanks
Nummo Staff

With the Presidential election just one day away, most voters already have their minds made up about who to vote for. However, as this crucial day comes closer, many still do not realize its significance. Not neccesarily the significance of the Mondale campaign, but the possibility of four more years of Ronald Reagan.

Mr. Reagan himself has made the threat very clear with his favorite campaign slogan, "You ain't seen nothing yet." If one takes the time to look at exactly what Mr. Reagan has done for/to this country, it becomes apparent that this slogan is indeed a "threat" and a very dangerous one.

A few facts about the Reagan administration may make this point clearer. Reagan brags consistently about his big tax cuts and how much they have saved the average American. Obviously, Reagan does not consider eighty percent of the population as average. The fact is that anyone making less than $20,000 a year (eighty percent) has paid MORE in taxes, while those making between $30-50 thousand (a mere fifteen percent of the population) have saved a whopping one percent in taxes, while the remaining five percent of the population making $51,000 and above received the largest tax break.

Are low-income college students or women "better off now"? More than 3 million school children have been dropped from school lunch programs, hundreds of thousands of women, infants and children have been cut from nutrition programs, 700,000 low- and moderate-income families have been unable to obtain Guaranteed Student Loans and over 5.4 million men and women have fallen into poverty--"You ain't seen nothing yet."

Reagan has: Cut real Federal spending to education by twenty-five percent, tried to eliminate the Department of Education and Federal aid to college education, gutted the Civil Rights Commission, tried to end the Voting Rights Act, spoke out against the Equal Rights Amendment, engaged in union busting, and supported the racist South African Regime and other dictatorships, and promised us, "You ain't seen nothing yet."

The evidence is strong and the threat is very clear. Yet in debate, Reagan and his supporters can only ramble on about a stronger America, a communist threat and something about cheating on welfare and buying steak with Food Stamps. We have yet to hear facts or weigh evidence, for there is no evidence of which to weigh. Only imagery, trickery and deceit.

If white America falls for the imagery (Black America has not), they will prove to be the most gullable, unknowledgable, selfish voting population in recent history. One Republican, who happened to be a woman, simply loved the television commercial of Reagan symbolically standing up to the mysterious bear (U.S.S.R.).

If a majority of the American voting public is this naive and ignorant of the facts, then Ronald Reagan will win tomorrow's election. However, we don't have to accept or be discouraged by the results of Mass Media's polls which state that Mondale doesn't have a chance.

Nummo News fully supports Democratic party candidates Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro. In the words of Jesse Jackson, "Our time has come" and, unlike Reagan, we believe whole-heartedly in the Voting Rights Act and popular participation. Therefore, we encourage everyone, no matter what your political beliefs are, to exercise your right to vote on Tuesday, November 6th.

Perspectives of a Divided Nation

by Rod Clare
Nummo Staff

Indira Ghandi, Hindu prime minister of India, was gunned down Wednesday in New Delhi by two vengeful Sikhs who were angered over the repression of their religious group through Gandhi's policies.

There has been tremendous strife between Sikhs and Hindus in India over the past few years. Sikhs, two percent of India's 730 million population, have felt that Hindus, seventy-eight percent of the population, control Sikh lives too much. A majority of Sikhs now favor creating a separate state in the Punjab region where Sikhs are over fifty percent of the population.

Last June, Gandhi moved to combat growing Sikh militance by ordering the invasion of the "Golden Temple in Amritsar," the Sikhs' holiest shrine, to rid it or extremists who were using it as a shelter. The official number of those killed is listed at 600 but this is highly disputed. There was and still is a news blackout along with a state of emergency taking place in the Punjab region so there was no free inquiry into the amount of people killed, but it is said that at least 1500 people were killed. Also, Golden Temple was not the only temple attacked. All the Sikh temples in India were invaded, raising the death toll as high as 30,000 in some estimates, a situation virtually unreported in the news media.

This incident galvanized the Sikh population, prodding even moderate Sikhs to take a more hard line approach. Cries that Ms. Gandhi be brought to justice were echoed throughout the Sikh community and some Sikhs threatened her life. Although hostilities had shown signs of slowing down, apparently enough anger remained among some Sikh individuals to cause such an attack to occur.

Indira Gandhi's rule was always somewhat autocratic. India is a country of such diverse religious and ethnic groups that it is very difficult to rule. The invasion of the Sikh temples was not the first time she ruled with an iron fist. She took part in a war against Pakistan in 1971 to help create the new nation of Bangladesh and among other things carried out forced sterilization measures against thousands of men during the mid-70's.

At the same time she was dearly loved by a great portion of the Indian population. Daughter of the first prime minister of India, Jawaharlal Nehru, she was said by many to be the mother of all India and the phrase "Indira is India" was often quoted in reference to her. The country had seen progress in agriculture and technology under her rule and she was often the unifying force that kept India together.

Her funeral took place last Saturday as many foreign heads of states attended the ceremonies. Meanwhile, major Hindu rioting is taking place throughout the country, with at least 500 Sikhs reported dead and thousands injured. Curfews along with orders for soldiers to shoot rioters on sight have been given by Rajiv Gandhi, Ms. Gandhi's son and the new prime minister of India, in order to quell violence.

Mr. Gandhi has been described as soft and inexperienced in Indian politics, entering the field in only 1980. It will be his major task to try and bring peace to a country that has always trod a thin line of stability and which now faces a serious crisis.

Today's Student Leaders, Tommorow's World Leaders

by Marilyn G.Bou
Nummo Staff

Keynote speakers, workshops, live music, a luncheon, and demonstrations, along with enthusiastic participants contributed to the overall success of this year's third world student leadership conference held at the University of Massachusetts/Amherst on Saturday, October 27th.

Workshops ranged in content from Housing Discrimination to International Health Issues. A workshop on Combating Racism, for example, discussed overt and covert methods of oppression. Mitchell Smith, director of A Better Chance House (ABC) in Amherst and facilitator of the workshop said there is no specific definition for the word racism because the word encompasses so much for so many. Educating no only ourselves but each other is something which we all must do in order for us to learn and unlearn about our past, present, and future.

Several booths displaying and selling jewelry, dies, and various products lined the Student Union Ballroom.

Mr. Playthell Benjamin, political advisor for the Nation Fight Back Labor Organization in New York City and keynote speaker, said in his address that Democrats are not the answer for all the problems minorities and the working class face, but another four years of Ronald Reagan can only be worse. He went on to say, "It is not an exaggeration to say that the rich are getting richer while the poor are getting poorer." Benjamin advised the young that an education is of utmost importance but it would by no means secure us a position at the top. Benjamin said, "through organized labor the working class can and had power, for the corporate elite are not interested in social good and social welfare, but in increasing their profits."

Ambassador Oumaru Youssofou, speaking during the lucheon began his speech by emphasizing to young and old and those in between the importance of retracing one's roots and origins. He said, "Only through obtaining this knowledge can you give and demand respect as Americans, for the image is distorted in the media. If you continue to believe what is given to you, you'll be in serious trouble."

United Nations Ambassador Oumaru Youssofou from the Organization of African Unity, gave an exciting and informative presentation at the Third World Leadership Conference.

Youssofou has served as Ambassador for various nations in Africa and has travelled extensively throughout the world. He said, "Americans must look at themselves not only as they want to se themselves but also accept the true image they portray to the rest of the world."

As Afro-Americans, Blacks, People of Color, or any other noun you wish to address yourself with, you have a responsibility to understand what is going on in South Africa because what ever effects Africa, effects you, whether indirectly or directly, Youssofou said.

Students are at their intellectual prime and also have the time flexibility, among other factors, needed to eliminate apartheis in South Africa, said Youssofou. He also said, "People who are bringing revolution to South Africa aren't people like me, but people like you."

When asked if UMass should divest from stock in South Africa Youssofou said, "We are not a violent people, but when Black South Africans are told that 34 million people don't exsist because the white South Africans don't want you to and you have struggled for over fifty years to peacefully negotiate, you then realize you can only be victorious if violence is applied. We have to kill in order to be free. So here you (America) take care of crushing them financially through divestment and we'll take care of the killing."

The conference ended with a spectacular karate demonstration. Pariticpants showed the audience the beauty of the "u" system of karate while effectly displaying the art of self-defense. The demonstration ended with the instructor breaking 200 pounds of cement blocks with his feet, elbows, hands, and head.

Those who paricipated in the conference enjoyed a day filled with cultural, educational, spiritual, and political enlightment; for those of you that didn't bother to partake, you are the losers.

Grenada Revisited

by Rod Clare
Nummo Staff

The U.S. invasion of Grenada which began on October 25, 1983 was the most recent in a series of American violations of the Carribbean countries' rights to sovereighty, according to a member of the Grenada Foundation.

Karen Wanza, Grenada Foundation member, said the intervention in Grenada is one example of U.S. expansionist tactics in the region. She cited the Bay of Pigs incident in 1961 and the blockade of Cuba which followed, and the destabilization of Jamaica as other examples.

Speaking on October 25 in response to the first anniversary "celebration" of the invasion, Wanza also discounted claims that U.S. national security was being threatened by the unstable Grenadian government set up after Prime Minister Maurice Bishop and members of his cabinet were killed. U.S. officials had feared communist infiltration in the new government.

Wanza and Lawyer's Committee against Intervention in Central American member Arthur Barisano appeared at the University of Massachusetts on "Student Liberation Day," which celebrated the anniversary of the American medical students at St. Georges University in Grenada.

Grenada is presently under much repression, according to Wanza. Although psychological warfare by U.S. forces against Grenadans is evident, the old political songs remain strong, as does the only independent newspaper in the country, which is the most widely read.

"A people united can never be defeated," Wanza said in closing her speech.

Barisano started his discussion of Central America, and the U.S. role there, by saying that the theoretical context for U.S. involvement in Central America since World War II has been anti-communism.

In the U.S. eyes, Barisano said, any people's uprising must be ultimately sponsored by Cuba or the Soviet Union. Barisano also said the one thing that President Reagan has consistentlv overlooked in the region is the severe poverty existing there.

Barisano said starving people do not need communists to tell them they are hungry.

Turning to the specific example of Nicaragua, Barisano said that Reagan views the country, which is ruled by the Sandanistas, as a cancer to be excised. Showing the Sandanistas to be more democratic than acknowledged by either the U.S. State Department or the press, he pointed to constant U.S. pressure as pushing the goverment further to the left.

Barisano said the basic purpose of the anti-communist rationale in Central America on the part of the U.S. is an excuse to get into the country and set up intelligence networks. "All the rules can be thrown out of the book because we're searching for communists"' Barisano said.

According to Barisano, he became involved with the Lawyers Committee Against Intervention in Central America because he felt the country was becoming too conservative. He said he was not sure if Walter Mondale was the answer to unifying moderates and liberals, but that he was a reponse to "Reagan's Social Darwinism."

AN ELECTION DAY MESSAGE: Jesse's Challenge Remembered

"The Democratic Party is the best hope for redirecting our nation on a more humane, just and peaceful course. This is not a perfect party, we are not a perfect people, yet we are called to a perfect mission. Our mission; to feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, to house the homeless, to teach the illiterate, to provide jobs for the jobless and to choose the human race over the nuclear race."

"Throughout this campaign I have tried to offer leadership to the Democratic party and the nation. If in my high moments I have done some good or offered some service, shed some light, healed some wounds, re-kindled some hope, or stirred someone from apathy and indifference or, in any way along the way, helped somebody, then this campaign has not been in vain...If in my low moments, in word, deed or attitude, through some error of temper, taste, or tone , I've caused anyone discomfort, created pain or revived someone's fears, that was not my truest self. If there were occasions when any grape turned into a raisin and my draw bell lost its resilience, please forgive me. Charge it to my head and not to my heart. My head so limited in its finitude, my heart which is boundless in its love for the human family. I am not a perfect servant, I am a public servant. Doing my best against the odds, if I develop and serve, be patient god is not finished with me yet...

"Leaders must be tough enough to fight, tender enough to cry, human enough to make mistakes, humble enough to admit them, strong enough to absorbe the pain and resilient enough to bounce back and keep on moving.

"Our flag is Red, White and Blue, but our nation is Rainbow, Red, Yellow, Brown, Black and White. We are all precious in God's sight.

We have proven that we can survive without each other but we have not proven that we can win and make progress without each other. We must come together.

We are bound by shared blood and shared sacrifices. We are much too intelligent, much to bound by Judiao-Christian heritage, much to victimized by racism, sexism, militarism, and Anti-Semitism. Much too threatened as historical scapegoats to go on divided, one from another. We must turn from finger pointing to clasped hands. We must share our burdens and our joys once again. We must turn to each other and not on each other and choose higher ground.

"The Rainbow Coalition is making room for Arab-Americans. They, too, know the pain and the hurt of racial and religious rejection. They must not continue to be made pariah. The Rainbow Coalition is making room for Hispanic Americans who, this very night, are living under the threat of the Simpson-Missola Bill. And farm workers from Ohio who are fighting the Campell Soup Company with a boycott to achieve legitimate worker rights. The Rainbow is making room for the Native American, the most exploited people of all. A people with the greatest moral claim amongst us. We support them as they seek the restoration of their ancient land claim amongst us...as they seek their ancestoral lands and the beauty of a land that was once all theirs...The Rainbow Coalition includes the Asian-Americans now being killed in our streets; scapegoats for the failures of corporate, industrial, and economic policies. The Rainbow is making room for young Americans. Twenty years ago, our young people were dying in a war for which they could not even vote. Twenty years later, America has the power to stop a war in Central America and the responsibility to vote in great numbers.

"I am more convinced than ever that we can win. We've fought up the rough side of the mountain, we can win. Our faith, hopes, and dreams will prevail."

Rev. Jesse Jackson

"Too often what we call hate, as if it were some deeply rooted philosophy or strategy, is simply ignorance, anxiety, paranoia, fear, and insecurity..."

"President Reagan says the nation is in recovery. Those 90,000 corporations that made a profit last year, but paid no taxes, are recovering. The 37,000 military contractors who have benefited from Reagan's more than doubling the military budget in peace time, surely they are recovering. The big corporations and rich individuals who have received the bulk of the 3-year multi-billion dollar tax cut from Mr. Reagan are recovering.

But no such recovery is on the way for the lest of these. Rising tides don't lift all boats, particularly those stuck at the bottom. For the boat stuck at the bottom, there's a misery index. This administration has made life more miserable for the poor. Its attitude has been contemptuous. Its policies and programs have been cruel and unfair to working people. But it must be held accountable in November for increasing infant mortality among the poor in Detroit, one of the great cities of the Western world. Babies are dying at the same rate as Honduras, the most underdeveloped nation in our hemisphere. This administration must be held accountable for policies that have contributed to growing poverty in America. There are now 34 million people in poverty; fifteen percent of our nation. Twenty-three million are white, 11 million are black, hispanic, asian, and others. Mostly women and children. By the end of this year, there will be 41 million people in poverty. We cannot stand idoly by, we must fight for change now!

Under this regime we look at Social Security. the 1981 budget cuts included 9 permanent Social Security benefit cuts totaling 20 billion dollars over 5 years. Small businesses have suffered under Reagan tax cuts. Only eighteen percent of total business tax cuts went to them. Eighty-two percent went to big business. Health care under Mr. Reagan has been sharply cut. Education under Mr. Reagan has been cut twenty-five percent. Under Mr. Reagan, there are now 9.7 million female-headed families. They represent sixteen percent of all families. Half of all of them are poor. Seventy percent of all poor children live in a house headed by a woman, where there is no man. Farmers' net income is only half its level of 1979.

In his appeal to the South, Mr. Reagan is trying to substitute flags and prayer for food,clothing, education, health care and housing. Mr. Reagan will ask us to pray and I believe in prayer...But then we must watch false prophecy. He cuts energy assistance to the poor, cuts breakfast programs from children, cuts lunch programs from children and then says to an empty table 'Let us pray.' Apparently he is not familiar with the structure of a prayer. You thank the lord for the food you are about to receive, not the food that just left. I think that we should pray. But don't pray for the food that just left, pray for the man that took the food to leave--We need a change in November."

"Under this administration we've lost the lives of our boys in Central America, in Honduras, in Grenada, in Lebanon, in Nuclear stand off in Europe. Under this administration, one-third of our children believe they will die in a nuclear war. The danger index is increasing in this world."

On voting...

It is not enough to hope the ERA will pass, how can we pass ERA? If blacks vote in large numbers, progressive whites win. It's the only way progressive whites win. If blacks vote in great numbers, hispanics win. When blacks, hispanics, and progressive whites vote, women win. When women win, children win. When women and children win, workers win. We must all come up together.

"In all of our joy and excitement, we must not save the world and lose our souls. We must never short-circuit enforcing the Voting Rights Act at every level. When one of us rise, all of us rise. Justice is the way out. Peace is the way out. We should not act as if nuclear weaponry is negotiable and debatable. In this world in which we live, we dropped the bomb on Japan and felt guilty. But in 1984, other folks also got bombs and this time if we drop the bomb, six minutes later, we, too, will be destroyed. It's not about dropping the bomb on somebody, it's about dropping the bomb on everybody. We must choose developed minds over guided missiles and think it out and not fight it out.

To the youth...

"I have a message for our youth. I challenge them to put hope in their brains and not dope in their veins. I told them that, like Jesus, I, too, was born in the slum. But just because you're born in the slum does not mean the slum is born in you. And you can rise above it if your mind is made up."

"We leave this place looking for the sunny side because there's a brighter side somewhere. I am more convinced than ever that we can win. We've fought up the rough side of the mountain, we can win. I just want young America to do me one favor...exercise the right to dream. You must face reality that which is, but then dream of the reality which ought to be, that must be. Live beyond the pain of reality with the dreams of a bright tomorrow. Use hope and imagination as weapons of survival and progress. Use love to motivate you and obligate you to serve the human family. Young America--Dream! Choose the human race over the nuclear race. Bury the weapons and don't bury people. YVONNE'S PLACE

The New World Theater at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst presents "Life in the Fast Lane" on Saturday, November 17, at 8 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium. Written and performed by Japanese Hawaiian poet, Lane Nishikawa, "Life in the Fast Lane" is a dynamic play about growing up Asian-American. Critics have called it a "one-man tour de force". From the country twang of the good ol' boy in 'The Bigot', to the street rap of 'The Black Jap', to the pigdin English of 'They Was Close, Those Brothers', to a recollection of foods prepared by his Oba-Chan (grandmother), Nishikawa shares his experiences with the audience. Produced by Sansei Productions of San Francisco, "Life in the Fast Lane" returns to Amherst after a successful performance at the University in 1982.

In conjunction with the play, Nishikawa will present a lecture demonstration on Asian-American Theater at 2 p.m. on November 17 at Emily Dickinson Hall, Hampshire College. The lecture is free and open to the public.

Tickets for the evening performance are available at the Fine Arts Center Box Office (545-2511) or at the door the night of the performance. Childcare can be provided by phoning 545-0190 one week prior.

SUPPORT GROUPS

A Battered Women's Support Group will focus on some common issues facing women who have been or are in physically and/or emotionally abusive relationships. Some of these are self-esteem, building new relationships, trust, and dealing with family and friends.

Any woman who has experienced incest is invited to attend an Incest Survivors' Support Group. Pre-registration is required.

A Support Group for Survivors of Rape will focus on some common concerns facing rape survivors such as,fear, anger, making plans, family and friends' reactions and trying to recapture intimacy in relationships.

Dates of the groups will be announced. For more information and to register, please call Everywomen's Center at 545-0883.

ASSERTIVENESS AND LEADERSHIP SKILLS

The Working Women's Program at Everywoman's Center will be sponsoring an Assertiveness and Leadership Skills group beginning October 23 and running for eight weeks. The group will meet on Tuesday evenings from 7-9p.m. at the EWC, and will be facilitated by Joyce Clark.

For more information and to pre-register please call EWC at 545-0883.

BLACK WOMAN'S SUPPORT GROUP

Everywoman's Center will be sponsoring Black Woman's Support Group beginning on October 24,1984 and running for six weeks. The group, which will meet on Wednesday evenings, will be facilitated by Wanda Ruffin. Discussion will focus on issues pertinent to Black women; specific topics will be decided by the group.

Harassment policy offers victim relief

By DEBORAH ROSS
Collegian Staff

[Editor's note: This is the second article in a two part series on sexual harassment.]

Sexual harassment is sex discrimination and therefore a violation of state and federal law, according to the University of Massachusetts Sexual Harassment Policy passed by the Faculty Senate in 1982.

The policy, and the grievance procedure developed to cope with it's violations, were drawn up over a four year period by a committee of students, staff and faculty to "Stop the behavior and more specifically enforce the law," said Grant Ingle, process consultant with the Office of Human Relations and Member of the Sexual Harassment Education Committee.

The policy and grievance procedure passed "because people were becoming aware that harassment was becoming an issue on campus but that there was not method of formal recourse," said Howard Gadlin, University ombudsman and co-chairman of the Sexual Harassment Education Committee.

According to the policy, sexual harassment includes: "sexual advances, requests for sexual favors and other verbal or physical conduct of a sexual nuture," when such conduct is a condition of an individual's work, interferes with their work performance, or creates an offensive working or academic environment.

"Sexual harassment is not just a question of poor manners, it's illegal," Ingle said.

Any member of the campus community who feels they have been sexually harassed and that the policy has been violated, has access to the University grievance procedure as follows:

- Individuals with sexual harassment complaints are encouraged to resolve them informally with first their department heads and then through the University ombudsman.
- If it is not resolved informally, formal grievance procedures begin with the filing of a written complaint and subsequent closed appearance before a board of three representatives of a trained sexual harassment hearing panel. It determines whether a violation of the policy has occured and proposes penalties.
- Appeal may be made to the vice chancellor whose decision within the university is final.
- Victims may also seek relief in the court or through non-university agencies.

During the academic years 1982 to 1984, 26 complaints have been initiated through the procedure although "they have all been resolved at the informal level," Gadlin said. "We are having our first formal hearing now."

"Although all possible gender combinations have occurred, the victims are predominantly women" and "the number of cases handled through the procedure serriously underestimates the incidence of the problem," he said.

According to Ingle "the biggest problem is getting the victim to complain." Similar to the victims of rape, 'harassment victims are frightened of the bureaucracy, stigma and retaliation involved in bringing a formal complaint," he said.

Ingle said, however, "all women should complain if they feel they have been a vietim" and stressed that the procedure is completely confidential.

Walkways in need of repair

Go everyway 'except where the students walk

By CHRIS POON
Collegian Staff

Pedestrian walkways near the Student Union Building will be reconstructed because the present paths are not suitable for the large number of people who use them.

"We have to build walks that understand that 25,000 students walk on them every day," Physical Plant Director Roger Cherewatti said. He said the walks between the Student Union and Goodell library, "go every which way except where the students walk."

The area in front of the Student Union, known as the "inner core," is the Campus Physical Planning Committee's top priority project, Chairman David Booth said.

Cherewatti said he asked the Landscape Architecture Department for assistance in developing a practical theme in the redevelopment of the inner core area. He said preliminary drawings of the development will be written after the 1986 Capital Improvement Budget is approved by the Massachusetts State Legislature.

Cherewatti said he wants $3.5 million for landscape improvement. Professional designers will probably be chosen to remodel the area in 1986 and construction wil begin in 1987, he said.

The committee has also identified two other major landscaping problems that need immediate attention, Booth said. A walking mall will be constructed on Stock bridge Road, extending from the Central Residential Area to Worcester Dining Commons, Booth said.

Signs need to be made that mark the University entrances is third on the committee's priority list, Booth said. Cherewatti said the signs will be placed at several points along North Pleasant Street and on Massachusetts Avenue.

Booth said that the signs will be illuminated and surrounded by shrubbery.

In addition to identifying landscaping priorities, the committee also advises the administration on long-term physical developments on campus, Booth said.

Tuck-ins put UMass to sleep

By KATHY KELLEY
Collegian Correspondent

Three people, dressed in evening gowns and suits, can enter your room and ply you with champagne, lollipops, Hershey kisses, and a real kiss goodnight.

No, this is not a dream.

The Hotel Sales & Marketing Association's (HSMA) "Tuck-in" Director, Brian Reynolds, says the event held each semester will take place on Nov. 7, when some students in the Greek and dormitory areas will be "tucked in for a good night's sleep." The 50 volunteer tuckers who are all members of HSMA will dress formally for the occasion.

They will also be "put into the right spirit," Reynolds said, "by a Happy Hour before they go out tucking."

Reynolds said the tuck-in service "breaks the tension of both the tuckers and tuckees and relieves the pressure that comes at this time of the year."

He said half of the $3 tuck in charge will go to "Brightside", a non profit organization in Springfield that cares for orphans. The other half goes to expenses such as champagne and lollipops. Reynolds said this is the first time the tuck-in service has contributed to charity.

"We usually break even but we may even lose this year," Reynolds said. "As future hotel and restaurant professionals, we do this to learn how to deal with different interest groups, like media," said Reynolds. "It will also give us a feel of what the hospitality industry will be like."

The tuck-in service is in its fifth semester and student reactions in the past have ranged from surprise to confusion and shock, Reynolds said. Some students enjoy the experience but others do not understand the operation. Reynolds mentioned that some tuckers have had the door slammed in their face by a frightened would-be tuckee. But most of the time, the confusion is explained away by the roommate or person responsible.

Tuck ins can be purchased on the Campus Center Concourse.

Two arrested during CIA recruitment

By BOB BURGESS
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts police yesterday arrested two people for trespassing after they refused to leave a Hampshire House office where recruitment interviews were being conducted by a Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) representative.

Police said that Perry M. Amsellem, a UMass legal studies major, and Lisa Sheehy, member of the Northampton Committee on Central America, were arrested yesterday about 10:30 a.m. after refusing to leave the office.

Amsellem and Sheehy were protesting with graduate students Jerry Fishbein and Ron Milcarek against the CIA recruiter's presence on campus.

Amsellem and Sheehy were arraigned yesterday in Northampton District Court and were released on a personal recognizancy, Amsellem said. A pretrial hearing has been set for Nov. 19, Amsellum said.

"It is clear that the CIA is not acting in the name of the people of the United States," Amsellem said. "And we are seriously questioning why UMass would allow a CIA recruitment process to occur."

Man arrested for DWI, cocaine possession

A 23-year old Beverly man was arrested at 4:55 a.m. Sunday and charged with possession of cocaine, driving while intoxicated and impeded operation of a motor vehicle, University of Massachusetts police said.

Police said that a car parked in P lot near the stadium was turned over on its side. The incident was reported at 2:09 a.m. Sunday but damages have not yet been estimated.

Eight people, including five UMass minors were arrested for various possession of alcohol and transporting charges in different incidents this past weekend, police said.

A 1974 Ford van was reported stolen at 12:15 p.m. Friday from lot 26, police said.

A set of luggage and its contents, valued at $300, were reported stolen at 4:51 p.m. Sunday, from a car parked in the Campus Center garage, police said.

Police said a couch, valued at $250, was reported stolen at 5:44 p.m. from the Cape Cod lounge in the Student Union Building. There are no suspects in the case.

A motorcycle parked near Hampden Dining Commons was vandalized causing $200 in damage, police said.

Police reported that a car's rear window was smashed while parked in lot 22, causing $150 in damage.

Shamie moves toward Kerry's lead

BOSTON — With a final pre-election poll showing their race getting tighter, Democrat John Kerry and Republican Ray Shamie toured the state Monday and presented their campaign messages to the voters for the last time.

The two men, who have spent a total of more than $3 million since January in trying to become the state's next U.S. senator, stuck with the themes that brought them victory in the Sept. 18 primary: Kerry as the protector of Democratic social programs and Shamie as the champion of President Reagan's tax cuts and reduced government spending.

The two men also enlisted their primary opponents for a final round of stumping. Political veteran Elliot Richardson toured eastern Massachusetts with Shamie while U.S. Rep. James Shannon joined Gov. Michael Dukakis, Sen. Edward Kennedy and other Democratic officials in urging support for Kerry.

A final pre-election poll, conducted Sunday night well after the visits to the state by President Reagan and Democrat presidential candidate Walter Mondale, found Kerry had only a 6-point lead over Shamie.

Kerry, the state's lieutenant governor, criss-crossed the state by airplane Monday, trying to hit as many media markets as possible and show people in various regions of the commonwealth that their votes were important to him.

Shamie stayed in eastern Massachusetts, touring town halls in Weston, Wellesley and other communities with Richardson before departing to join Kerry at an old fashioned political rally in Boston's West Roxbury neighborhood.

Toxin law ignored by many

BOSTON — Less than 2 percent of the companies in Massachusetts have complied with a month-old law requiring them to tell their employees and the state about the toxic substances they use, according to a report published Monday.

The state's 128,000 firms had until Sept. 26 to tell the state Division of Environmental Quality Engineering (IEQI) about the toxic substances at their facilities, but only 2,000 have complied with the law, so far, The Boston Globe said.

However, state officials said they are not alarmed by the lack of compliance to the "Right-to-Know" law because many of the firms may not have to respond because they do not use toxins.

Myra Schwartz, IEQE's right-to-know coordinator, said there may be only about 6,000 major users or generators of toxic wastes in the state and that 20,000 to 40,000 companies may have no hazardous chemicals and are exempt from reporting.

"It's almost impossible to tell you how many people we will hear from," she said. "There are 1,500 substances we are talking about."

She said many firms don't know about the law and many others are waiting for information from chemical manufacturers. Most big companies have answered, and the responses average 50 to 100 pages, she said. "A lot of companies are trying to comply."

The law requires manufacturers; businesses, including dry cleaning and auto body shops; universities, banks, insurance companies, industries and cities and towns to list toxic substances they use.

Ex U.S. Rep dies

WORCESTER — Harold Daniel Donohue, a 14-term U.S. congressman who served on the House Judiciary Committee during the Watergate scandal, died Sunday at St. Vincent's Hospital. He was 83.

Donohue represented the 3rd District and the former 4th District in the House of Representatives from 1946 until his retirement in 1974. He was a longtime Worcester resident and practiced law in the city when he was not in Washington.

During his last year in Congress, Donohue concentrated on his duties in the House Judiciary Committee which conducted the Watergate impeachment hearings against former President Richard Nixon.

Donohue was born in Worcester in 1901. He graduated from St. John's Preparatory School in 1920 and Northeastern University School of Law in 1926 after four years of night school.

University criticized for concert policy

By JONATHON PERRY
Collegian Correspondent

The decision by University of Massachusetts administrators to restrict ticket sales to the two Frank Zappa concerts on Oct. 28, has drawn criticism from the shows' producers.

The first show at 7 p.m. was restricted to UMass students, faculty and staff and was about 200 tickets short of selling out said Lance Foley, talent coordinator for the Union Program Council (UPC).

The second show was restricted to five college students and attracted 650 students, enough to fill the first four of the 38 rows of seats, Foley said. "It definitely hurt our revenue," he said.

The decision to restrict ticket sales was part of the Halloween restriction of on-campus events that weekend. The decision was made the first week of October, by John DeNyse, vice chancellor of administration and finance, Dennis Madsen, vice chancellor for student affairs and Randy Donant and Michael Jones of the Student Activities Office, Foley said.

UPC was not consulted or informed of the decision until four days before tickets went on sale, he said. Madsen said UPC members should have anticipated the administrative action.

"The UMass policy is a four-year-old restriction," he said. "Clearly, UMass has had a history of limiting Halloween events, and our decision was based on the same kind of rationale we've had the last four years."

"Our office staff seems to be together in our support of UPC," Jones said. "We're talking about four or five years ago that all of this bad business happened. The students seem to be very resposible in the way they present activities and I think it's time to give the students the benefit of the doubt," Jones said.

Donant, director of the office, said, "It's important that we look to the future to make sure this type of thing doesn't happen again." A proposed compromise to open the first show to the general public was rejected by the other administrators involved, Donant and Jones said.

"Normally, every show we produce, we sell to UMass and the community," Foley said. "Had UPC been able to sell to the general public, we probably would have sold out both shows and maybe made a profit."

DeNyse said that the decision addressed a concern of the UMass community based on "the problems we've had in the past when the campus was open to everybody."

Foley said that UPC, which produces about 30 shows a year, tries to get back 80 percent of its programming money for each show. UPC is funded by the Board of Governors, the Student Activities Trust Fund and the UMass Arts Council.

The exclusion of non-students from campus on Halloween weekends began four years ago in response to vandalism on campus.

Kerry, Shamie ignore financial aid letter

Other candidates also fail to respond to query on stand

By NANCY A. BUKAR
Collegian Staff

John Kerry and Ray Shamie, contesters for the U.S. Senate seat in Massachusetts and other candidates running for office failed to respond to a letter sent by students at the University of Massachusetts that asked whether they supported financial aid.

The letters, sent by Students Advocating Financial Aid (SAFA) on October 12, asked, "If elected, will you support the current federal programs of financial aid to students in higher education, and current level of appropriations? If not, what changes will you support?" The letter emphasized that responses would be revealed "to our student body of 25,000 before November 6."

The letters were sent to 24 candidates and seven responses were received, according to Cynthia Howland, president of SAFA.

"I think that Kerry and Shamie, above all, should have made sure that a letter be returned," said Howland. "I think it reflects poorly on them. It's really saying something when our two people running for a Senate seat haven't returned letters to their state university."

SAFA received responses from Rep. Silvio Conte (R-Pittsfield), Mary Wentworth, Conte's Democratic opponent, Rep. Gerry Studds (D-New Bedford), Lew Crampton, Studds' Republican opponent, Rep. Nicholas Mavroules (D-Peabody), Rep. Edward Boland (D-Springfield)and Rep. Barney Frank (D-Fall River).

Howland expressed some surprise at Conte's letter supporting financial aid. Conte voted against the Wright bill, a measure to increase funds for financial aid and social welfare programs for fiscal year 1985, she said.

"Nobody sent us a letter saying they were against it (financial aid). The only one that really didn't impress me was Lew Crampton-he didn't even use his own letterhead," Howland said. Crampton's response was a written "yes" directly on the original letter that SAFA had sent.

Womens Forum

Women's Forum is a weekly listing of events relating to women's issues. Notices should be sent to the Women's News Editor, care of the Collegian, the Friday before the event.

TUESDAY — The Working Women's Program at the Everywoman's Center is sponsoring an Assertiveness and Leadership Skills group from 7 to 9 p.m. This is the third in a series of eight and will be facilitated by Joyce Clark.

WEDNESDAY — The Everywoman's Center will sponsor a Career Development Skills Group from 7 to 9 p.m. It will be facilitated by Joyce Clark.

Graduate Woman's Admission and General Educational Support (WAGES) sponsors a brown-bag luncheon every Wednesday from noon to 2 p.m. in Campus Center Room 805-809.

The Women's Caucus will meet at 4 p.m. in Room 415 of the Student Union Building. All women senators are encouraged to attend.

THURSDAY — My Sister in this House, an award-winning drama about four lonely women, will play at Hampshire College at 8 p.m. Admission is $2.50.

Susan Heschel will give a talk "On Being a Jewish Feminist" at 4.15 p.m. in the Chaplain Lounge at Amherst and again at 7:30 p.m. in Seelye Hall at Smith College.

FRIDAY — The Women's Admissions and General Educational Support (WAGES) program at the Everywoman's Center is holding a support group for graduate women from 7 to 9 p.m.

The rape hotline is 545-0800.

Carol Johnson, co-chairwoman of the Sexual Harassment Education Committee said, "I don't think women really understand the procedure," because "all the research and data shows that women are afraid of the reporting environment (formal hearing)."

According to Gadlin, the procedure is still in the midst of evaluation "with every feature being looked at," and expects "to have some revisions by the end of this year."

Although the policy and procedure are campus wide, a student who wishes to bring a complaint against another student may also do so under Section 2B 1 or the Code of Student Conduct said Charmaine Wijeyesinghe, a judicial liason for the Dean of Students Office.

Under this section harassment includes, "verbal and or written invasion or violation of any individuals rights through graffiti, obscene telephone calls and or other means."

In cases of student complaints against another student informal resolution is first sought either through the victim's resident director if the student lives in a dormitory or through the Dean of Students Office.

If informal resolution fails, either party has a right to a closed hearing with the Student Judicial Board. The Board's decision may be appealed either to the Residential Appeals Board or the University Discipline Board.

According to Wijeyesinghe, 24 cases were handled by the Dean of Students Office for the 1983 academic year. "I don't think that adequately reflectes the problem out there, the biggest problem is getting victims to come forward," she said.

"The best way to deal with it is to educate people about harassment," and "education on sexual harassment is absolutely essential in changing the norms of how men treat women," she said.

200 pints of UMass blood wanted

In addition to its weekly effort, the American Red Cross is holding a special blood drive today through Thursday in the Student Union Ballroom from 9:30 to 3:30 p.m.

The special drive, held every semester, is shooting for 200 pints of blood each day, according to Richard Rubin, field representative for Western Mass.

Rubin said that they need about 220 people to donate each day, and welcome both students and faculty.

"UMass will be carrying most of the weight for this drive," Rubin said.

The drive is being sponsored by the Faculty Wives, Gamma Sigma Sigma, and Alpha Phi Omega.

★protesters

The CIA representative was on campus as part of the University Placement Service (UPS) program, which schedule interviews for students with prospective employers.

According to Clark Edwards, UPS associate director, the University does not choose organizations to come to UMass for recruitment unless surveys through advertisement response and student resumes show that a market for a company's visit exists amoung UMass students.

Edwards said that although people showed interest in the CIA, the recruiter left campus early because only four people had spoken to him.

Jerry Fishbein said yesterday that the demonstration had been organized by the Radical Student Union and the Western Massachusetts Latin American Solidarity Committee. The protest was expected to draw about 25 people, but that number diminished because most of the planned participants were arrested for civil disobedience demonstrations this weekend in Washington D.C.

Just wondering about Reagan

In a recent interview, Ronald Reagan criticized Walter Mondale for picking Geraldine Ferraro for his running mate because he believes the choice was based on her sex and not her experience.

Reagan was quoted as saying "I guess what I'm trying to say is that the [selection] must be based not just purely on the sex of the candidate, but must also be based on the qualifications of the candidate." He also suggested that the choice was "tokenism or cynical symbolism."

Now I was wondering: If Reagan is so much against choosing women for important roles because of their sex and not their experience (and Ferraro has served three terms in the House of Representatives, far more experience than many Vice Presidential candidates), then why did he choose the relatively unknown and undistinguished Sandra Day O'Connor for the Supreme Court?

Mr. Armacost and his friends from the Flat Earth Society continue to mislead and misquote scientific literature in order to persuade the public that flouridation is BAD. Fluoride is not a drug! It is a mineral essential for proper nutrition as are iodine, calcium and many other substances. True, it is only required in relatively minor amounts and is deleterious if given in excess dosages, but the same holds for most other nutrients — even pure water!

It is also true that dental cavities have decreased nationwide in part due to better nutrition and to some extent because the general level of fluoride in food has increased. However, in areas of low natural fluoride availability, such as ours, we still are below the optimal level recommended — one part per million! Mr. Armacost cites a judge's opinion against fluoridation. Legal procedures cannot make scientific decisions — they merely affirm or negate opinions. Be that as it may — no anti-fluoridation decision has ever been sustained by a court of last resort! No reputable source has ever documented a case of injury due to fluoridated water in 100 years' experience with natural fluorides and 40 years' of fluoridated water — well beyond the lag period for cancer to occur, yet anti-fluoridationists continue to raise this specter. There are documented cases of death due to systemic infection from tooth decay!

Your friends from Boston, New York and many other municipalities with public water supplies (over 120 million Americans) enhance their chances to have healthy teeth — we think Amherst's children are entitled to the same.

Otto L. Stein
Professor of Botany

Fluoridation? Answer today

The following facts dealing with the efficiency and cost of fluoridaung Amherst's public water supply were obtained from the State Department of Public Health's engineering prospective prepared in April for Amherst's Board of Health, and should be carefully considered by voters in arriving at their decision as to how to vote on the upcoming referendum question.

Approximately 24,000 pounds (12 tons) per year of sodium fluoride would be added to Amherst's water supply at five or six points of application. Of these 24,000 pounds, only a maximum of five pounds would be utilized to provide the 1 p.p.m. dosage suggested for some 2,500 children if each drank the necessary daily amount of fluoridated water. The remaining 23,995 pounds of fluoride would be in water used for cooking, dishwashing, showering and bathing, flushing toilets, clothes washing, watering flowers and lawns, washing cars, air-conditioning and commercial purposes; with most of it ending up in the Connecticut River!

Amherst already has an excellent low-cost dental care program for their school children and fluoridation would be of little, if any, benefit. The yearly cost of the proposed fluoridation of the water is $15,000 for Sodium Fluoride, $6,400 for daily labor, $1,000 for electricity and $2,000 for amortization of equipment.

Water Department operators handling sodium fluoride will be required to wear protective gear — gloves, goggles and dust masks.

Amherst has a complex water system and most agree the water is not of the best quality. Adding sodium fluoride will not improve its quality and will only result in further complications. Fluoridation was tried in Northampton and discontinued because of operating problems. Agawam, Chicopee and Springfield have voted overwhelmingly against fluoridation. If there is any doubt about safety, efficiency or cost, the prudent thing to do is leave it out. Vote "NO" on Question 1 today.

To master your career in business, see The Specialist. Bentley Graduate School.

Organizations in today's complex business world need both competent general managers and skilled specialists with expertise in specific business functions. That's why Bentley College offers students a choice of five different graduate business programs.

You can select from four specialized master of science programs, in accountancy, computer information systems, finance or taxation, to complement your undergraduate degree in liberal arts, science or business. Or choose our unique MBA program that, unlike most other MBAs, is tied into our specialized programs, allowing you six areas of concentration plus interaction with fellow students and professors with specialized perspectives.

Located just nine miles from Boston on Route 128, Massachusetts' high-technology highway, Bentley College offers graduate programs that mirror the real-world business environment where general managers and their more specialized colleagues work hand-in-hand to achieve success for their organizations and their own careers.

If you're looking to be the master of your business future, see The Specialist. Send this coupon to the Bentley College Graduate School or call (617) 891-2108.

OPINION

The opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the university unless otherwise noted.

Vote for the issues

Today, University of Massachusetts students, staff, faculty and administrators will vote for candidates who will lead this nation and the state for the next several years. By casting their votes for the candidates, voters will also be making choices on issues that will shape the future of this country.

Too often, the real issues at stake can be lost amid campaign rhetoric. We urge that voters not only choose the candidates who they feel will best lead the country, but also to vote for the candidates who have demonstrated a knowledge of the issues and willingness to work to benefit all of America.

The Collegian feels the following issues merit voters' attention while casting ballots today, and we urge you to decide according to their stands on these issues.

Equal Rights Amendment: Vote for the candidate who opposes discrimination in all its forms, and who supports a Constitutional mandate guaranteeing equal rights and equal opportunities for all Americans.

Nuclear Freeze: The senseless nuclear arms build-up squanders resources for all Americans while endangering the security and future of the entire human race. Vote for the candidate who supports a mutually-verifiable freeze, the first step toward reducing tensions and the nuclear stockpile.

Financial Aid: Vote for the candidate who believes that the federal government should insure that anyone who wants or needs an education should not be denied that right to opportunity because of economic hardship.

Abortion: Vote for the candidate who supports a woman's right to control her own body.

Social Security: America's elderly, who have supported the government all their lives, should not have to live in constant fear that their benefits will be cut back without their consent. Vote for the candidate who supports strong social security programs for the elderly and disadvantaged.

Central America: Vote for the candidate who will not allow U.S. tax money to support corrupt and cruel regimes, and who will not allow the United States to become involved in international terrorism, in that region.

Supreme Court: Vote for the candidate who will make sure the people who interpret the Constitution represent all Americans, not just special interest groups.

Federal Budget: Vote for the candidate who has a realistic plan to reduce the huge federal deficit that threatens the economic future for all Americans. Vote for the candidate who will distribute the government's money fairly and sensibly.

The United States government was built on the ideal of equal opportunity for all. Vote today to support those ideals.

Democrats and the future

Andrew M. Paven

"He cumbers himself never about consequences, about interests: he gives an independent, genuine verdict."
Ralph Waldo Emerson, from Self-Reliance

On this election day, when President Reagan will be elected to his second term, there are many who say that Walter Mondale's campaign is the last gasp of the old-style Democratic Party.

But it cannot be argued that there is a great re-alignment, portending GOP dominance, at hand. A recent Harris Poll indicated that by a two-by-one margin, voters said they thought that the country would be worse off if Reagan had a Republican majority in the House with which to work, than it would if the Democrats retained control of the House.

But de-alignment, wherein party affiliation counts for less than individual drawing power, seems plausible — at least for now. It is evidenced in the fact that many of those who voted for Gary Hart in the primaries will be voting for Reagan today. Reagan appeals to them, as Hart did, as the maverick outsider fighting against what is perceived as an ineffective system.

Ralph Whitehead, professor in UMass' Journalism Department, said on WGBY's Face the State last Friday that the Democratic Party cannot chalk up this year's results to nothing more than an unsuccessful race against a popular incumbent President and assume that no changes need be made to the party between now and 1988.

But what about after that?

Whitehead mentioned that he notices among his students and others not selfishness per se, but a desire for independence, a desire to succeed without too much help — a desire for self-reliance.

I watched a professor from Harvard's Kennedy School of Government say something along these lines on Channel 2's Ten O'Clock News one night, after John Kerry and Ray Shamie had debated about poverty in Boston's South End.

This professor said that the positive reaction of those in poverty when Shamie says, "I made it on my own and so can you, without government handouts" should not be discounted. He said it relates to the pioneer spirit of this country, and those who are poor want desperately to believe. This is the same spirit of independence that Whitehead sees as emerging and of which Reagan preaches.

But Reagan's spirit of self-reliance has not worked for the betterment of the many: More people live in poverty today than have at any time since 1961; five million newly-impoverished since he took office — in 1982 alone, 325,000 children. Median income in 1983 was up from 1982, but was still lower than it was in 1980 — the last year of Jimmy Carter's presidency.

As many people are out of work now as were when he first took office and in an economically-ravaged place like Gary, Indiana, unemployment is still around 18 percent. The economy is booming, yes, but not from cuts in the federal budget as was promised but, rather, from a massive Keynesian infusion of capital into the budget of the Defense Department that has driven up the Federal Deficit to an unprecedented level. Inflation is down, but interest rates remain some nine or 10 percent above the rate of inflation, thus real interest rates are about what they were when he took office.

And still Reagan will be elected by a landslide — dreams die hard. The dream of being self-reliant is powerful and regardless of Reagan's success in his second term, it will probably still live on in 1988. In the Democratic Party, charismatic, but old-line Mario Cuomo may have his hands full with a populist like Hart.

But beyond 1988?

It seems to me that reliance on the Union, the Social Program and the Coalition did not spring full-blown like Athena, but grew up as a reaction to a system that did not fulfill the wants and needs of the populace. The individual found that his or her strength rested in the numbers provided by the institution.

If this populist mood of self-reliance continues, with only the limited economic success of the last four years, and those who were once employed by core industries in union jobs — or their children who succeed them — find that because of de-industrialization the salaries of their new non-union jobs in the service industries cannot provide them with the standard of living to which they aspire, then there may be a strong return in 1992 or 1996 to coalition politics.

The unions and the social programs grew out of felt needs. If those needs are not met by populist self-reliance, then it will be interesting to see what happens to the corpse of the old Democratic Party.

By process of elimination, the winner is...

Geez, these certainly aren't the good ole days. Somebody told me that these days are better; that these are the best days mankind has ever seen. That is precisely the type of vote getting, upper-middle-class, idealistic bullshit that politicians (and thus our government) are thriving on.

Well, it's election time again. It's time for glorious rallies, elaborate campaign platforms, and cheering crowds. It's election time again; it's time for fear.

The bathroom stalls are becoming politically active again. I read one neatly done, well-researched statement this groggy morning warning young Republicans to wake up. It warned them that good ole Ronnie has been brainwashing them for the last four years. Following the warning were several of the 'bad' things that he has done. "VOTE DEMOCRATIC, VOTE MONDALE!" was the cry of this bathroom editorial. Another message, scrawled across the wall in the anger motif, stated, "FRITZ SUCKS! VOTE AMERICAN!"

understood human rule that those with money can't lose.

These are the days of wishy-washiness. Honorable men with brilliant minds, and brilliant pens, do not run for political office anymore. There are no more Ben Franklins or Thomas Jeffersons. Instead we, today, have actors and businessmen, people who know how to get ahead but don't know how to treat those who are beneath them. It's a tough, complicated world and it's difficult to please everyone, but today's leaders please nobody but those who have money — those who get votes.

Both Mondale and Reagan are less than what I would choose to be the President. I'd like neither of them to be President. What it boils down to, though, is that I dislike Reagan more so I'm going to vote for Mondale to keep Ronnie out of office. It's a sad state of affairs when we have to employ the process of elimination to vote for the most powerful office in the world.

Issues before canidates

By YADIRA A. BETANCES
Collegian Staff

Today, the American people will make a very important decision. The decision is a tough one, but it will determine the future of America and what course the destiny of the world will take, particularly in Central America, South Africa and the Middle East.

Because the 1984 elections will be one of the most important elections in the history of America, before deciding which presidential candidate will best represent us and cater to our needs as Blacks and minorities, a review of the present administration is necessary.

First, let's start with the cruel realities. During the first half of 1984, 16.5 Blacks were unemployed, according to the Monthly Labor Review. This figure does not include people who have hopelessly given up looking for a job.

U.S. aid to El Salvador in the past four years is $1 billion.

The number of U.S. supported guerrillas in Nicaragua is 15,000.

The number of civilians killed in El Salvador since the present administration took office is 40,000. El Salvador's population is five million.

The present administration tore up the Civil Right Commission, while telling the American public that it has a great Civil Rights record.

This is the same administration that cut the CETA program, Welfare and school lunches, which help Blacks and minorities make ends meet.

Anti-discrimination regulations for federal contractors doing business with the federal government has been relazed. In 1979, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission filed 306 employment discrimination cases against employers; in fiscal year '82, the EEOC filed only 104.

As a "christian," President Ronald Reagan supports the racist government of South Africa.

To cite how the present administration have turned back the clock on civil rights and on programs to create opportunities for Blacks and other minorities will take the entire Collegian.

When choosing a candidate today, look at the issues, review the records and make the RIGHT choice.

UMass provost is a man with many hats

By MARANN CASSELL
Collegian Staff

Dr. Frederick Tillis wears many hats.

Director of the Fine Arts Center at the University of Massachusetts, and assistant provost, he is also a musician, a composer, and an educator.

As a composer he has written more than 68 compositions, both of jazz and classical European style. He is also a classical American jazz saxophonist. Since 1966 he has deliberately written in a style based upon elements that are natural outgrowths of his ethnic and cultural background. Some rhythmic structural influences in his work go back to Africa, including various elements of jazz. Tillis has written and published texts on Jazz Theory and Improvisation. He has performed in over 33 public performances and has published over a dozen books and recorded over seven symphonic pieces.

He proved his musical abilities Friday when he appeared as special guest at the Big Band Music of the 50s and 60s at the FAC. Tillis' performance was exquisite. He played the saxophone with the energetic blow that made the audience cheer with much enjoyment.

As an educator, Dr. Tillis feels very strongly about the education provided at UMass. "It is very healthy and good," he said.

"I think the University of Massachusetts is a very strong public university. I point out that it is a very strong public university because I believe its very success in education is a cross-section of students probably with greater range of understanding than can be found in many private institutions," he said.

"Aside from academic strength it has developed a critical mass of diverse ethnic and racial groups of students, which serve to teach basic attitudes regarding the give and take of members in our educational community," Tillis said.

Tillis sees the increase of Third World students at the University a need for diversity being met. "It's ecstatic, marvelous, and it's good for the University," he said.

"It make the University a richer place in terms of its racial and ethnic body, which American democracy strives to achieve," he said.

Caribbean week slated

By PAULA DUVAL
Collegian Correspondent

Attempting to embrace Caribbean people in a week of cultural events, the Caribbean week will be celebrated at the University of Massachusetts starting tomorrow with a music, art and literature tertulia.

The week will be highlighted by a poetry reading by Jose Ramon "Che" Melendez, a Puerto Rican poet on Thursday at the Campus Center at 4:30. A film entitled "The Two Worlds of Angelita," will be shown later that night. A panel discussion on the conflicts and prejusism confronted by Caribbean inmigrants in the United States will be held on Saturday at 1:00 p.m. in Romm 803 of the Campus Center.

The theme of this year's celebration is Caribbean Unity.

The celebration is sponsored by AHORA, the Latin American student organization at UMass.

Ruthie Arroyo, AHORA member explained Caribbean people are united by their Indio-African roots despite cultural differences such as language.

"Our rhythms, feelings and history is one," Arroyo said.

"Che" Melendez is a political poet. Many Puerto Rican singers put music to his poems as part of the "new song" movement.

The movie is the story of a Puerto Rican girl torn between the American and the Spanish culture.

The fiftieth anniversary of the Western Mass. Veneremos Brigade will be celebrated Friday at Yvonne's Place in the New Africa House within the week of activities.

"(At AHORA) We are doing a job with a bright future," Arroyo said.

Asian advisory program successful

By KIMBERLY BURGE
Collegian Correspondent

A program emphasizing friendship designed to help Asian American students make the transition from high school to college has been very successful during its two years, the program's coordinator said.

Carol Young, assistant director of the Committee for the Collegiate Education of Blacks and Other Minorities (CCEBMS) said, "the purpose of the program is to help Asian American students blend into the University community and establish a strong sense of identity."

As a minority group, Asian students face many prejudices. One major prejudice is that all Asian students excel in academics. This creats a negative-positive feeling toward the students placing them under subconscious pressure to succeed, especially in the sciences, he said.

Another prejudice that Asian students face are the stereotypes created and enforced by the media. "The media portrays Asian women as exotic, erotic, mystical, and special in worldly ways. It portrays Asian men as awkward, gawky and nerd like," Young said. "We have represen tatives of all types of personalities just like all other races of people," she said.

The program helps students overcome these prejudices by providing a support group and generating camaraderie among the Asian students. It also helps to break the stereotypes and create internal pride amoung the Asian student community.

During the spring, the program sends out flyers, a program's representative talk to Asian American groups, upperclassmen, and former peer advisors to see it they are interested in the program.

Advisors meet once or twice a semester with Young to discuss orientation, talk about schedule, and attend various workshops.

"We want the students to feel as if they are talking to a "big brother" or 'big sister," Young said.

She said the program helps make the transition easier for Asian American students and the students make more friends among the Asian community. Many of the advisors are former advisees of the program. Young stated they volunteer for the program because "the program helped them so much that they want to pass on what they have learned to others."

Announcements

The Center for Racial Studies in Moore House, Southwest is sponsoring a film series. The series will show films about American minorities starting tonight at 7 with the Asian-American film, "Guilty by Reason of Race."

Other films to be shown will be, Nov. 13, "To Be Young, Gifted and Black" about the life and works of Black playwright Lorraine Hansberry; Nov. 20, "Brave-hearted Woman" a Native American film about the life of Annie Mae Aquash and "Number Our Days" an account/creation of a Jewish community ageism to be shown Nov. 27.

The Cape Verdean Student Alliance will have a meeting Thursday at 5 p.m. in the New Africa House 2nd floor lounge.

CAE/CAD/CAM
AT COMPUTERVISION

THE FUTURE IS YOURS TO DESIGN

As a Fortune 1000 leader with an installed base in excess of $1.25 billion, Computervision Corporation has the resources to build on your best ideas — ideas that will help revolutionize plant design and construction, microelectronics, aerospace, energy, mapping, and industrial and consumer products manufacturing. Resources to help you play a vital role in creating our new generation of CAE/CAD/CAM systems that will bring the integration of Computer-Aided Engineering/Design/Manufacturing within the reach of every industry.

We pioneered CAD/CAM. Today, we're an industry leader, constantly developing and implementing solutions of the future. For example, we recently launched a development program designed to make CAE/CAD/CAM technology even more comprehensive and accessible to a much greater number of industrial and commercial users. The result of the program is a three-tiered product offering: the CDS-3000, CDS-4000, and CDS-5000 Series. The CDS-3000 Series of intelligent workstations is designed to bring 32-bit microprocessing power to the engineer's desk for a variety of focused CAE/CAD/CAM applications. The CDS-4000, the heart of the CDS family of integrated systems, offers functionality unmatched in the industry and sets the standard for productivity, cost-effectiveness, quality of results and expandibility for multi-application, high performance systems. Our large CDS-5000 provides sophisticated applications tools never before offered for relational database management to interface with other information processing tools, plus CAE/CAD/CAM data distribution and management capability.

Our unprecedented success in the past and our very practical vision of the future offers talented creative engineers a wide variety of challenging opportunities in areas such as:

MARKETING
SOFTWARE ENGINEERING
HARDWARE ENGINEERING
DIAGNOSTICS ENGINEERING
APPLICATIONS PROGRAMMING
QUALITY ASSURANCE
MANUFACTURING
CUSTOMER SERVICE

If you want a future that includes working on the most exciting technologies in a fast-track environment, consider Computervision Corporation. We will be on campus November 13th. Please contact your Placement Office to arrange an interview, or send your resume to:

Cushing aids UM's men's soccer rejuvenation

Duxbury All-American sees success in Minutemen's future

By SCOTT HOOD
Collegian Staff

Rare indeed is the blue-chip schoolboy soccer All-American who would even consider journeying to Amherst for four years of higher education at the University of Massachusetts. Especially without a full scholarship.

Matt Cushing is one of the exceptions. Named to Parade Magazines High School All-American Soccer team last year as a member of powerful Duxbury (MA.) High School, the 5-11, 170-lb. Cushing never gave second thoughts to enrolling at UMass despite the University's less-than-overwhelming reputation for soccer prowess and financially more attractive offers from other institutions.

"I always wanted to go to UMass. Three generations of my family have attended school here," said Cushing. "You're not just playing soccer in college. It's four years of your life and you've got to go where you want to go."

A three-year starter for Duxbury, Cushing was originally a forward, but switched to center-halfback in his sophomore year when injuries struck. He has been at that position ever since.

"In Duxbury you start playing soccer at about eight years old," said Cushing. "To play for the varsity is such a big thing. Everyone wants to play on the soccer team."

In his senior season, Cushing scored 30 goals, including eight in the state tournament. However, most of his accomplishments were overshadowed by the exploits of Yale-bound Steve Cass, who has scored more than 130 goals in his career. Nevertheless, due primarily to his post-season scoring explosion, Parade Magazine named Cushing as one of the top 12 high school players in the country.

"All the college scouts are at those tournament games, plus all the newspapers, so I got some headlines," said Cushing. "Being named to the All-American team is something I'll cherish for a long time. It's something every high school athlete strives for, but I was surprised I got it. At the beginning of the season, because you're the state champs, people notice you. But being an All-American was something I never gave much thought."

Cushing met UMass coach Jeff Gettler at a soccer camp run by Williams coach Mike Russea and Amherst College coach Peter Gooding. Although Gettler and Cushing kept in contact for two years, the third-year Minutemen coach didn't seriously recruit Cushing until the latter's senior year.

"He was real positive," said Cushing of his current mentor. "I knew he was a great coach. I felt if I came here I could help out and turn the program around."

Last year UMass was 3-12-1. However, with new talent like Cushing, Kurt Manal, and Andy Bing infiltrating the lineup, the Minutemen have surged to a surprising 9-6-3 record. And with only two seniors on the present squad the prospects for greater future success appears bright.

"With the players we have now, we can definitely be a top contender," said Cushing. "The biggest thing that helped the team this year was the new players' attitudes. Myself, Bingo, and Kurt were used to winning and that seemed to rub off on the other players."

Success however does not come so easy at this level. Cushing, in adjusting to the college game, has battled injuries and a scoring slump. A hamstring injury that he first suffered in middle September cropped up again in recent days and put him on the bench for the last few games of the campaign and, although he has scored only one goal, Cushing does feel he has improved and matured as a player, especially on the defensive end.

"Scoring-wise, it's been a pretty disappointing season for myself," said Cushing. "However, I'm much better defensively. I really had no idea how to be an effective defensive player. The first three or four games I was having trouble on the attack because I was so worried about staying marked with my man because I was so unfamiliar with it."

Cushing has quickly found in his first year, the college soccer atmosphere to be quantum leaps ahead of high school, especially in terms of strategy and the talent possessed by the players on both sides.

"You can't hide a player in college," said Cushing. "In college you have to put 11 good players on the field. The emphasis is to keep possession. In high school there was a lot of kick-and-run. Tactically, the game's so much more progressive in college. People know what they're doing. You can't get away with some things like in high school.

"Mentally, college soccer is so much more demanding. The pressure from everything just mounts. You are expected to produce. I came in as and All-American and was probably expected to do sensational things. I feel I was getting better with every game, but then I got injured and that has been holding me back."

"I'm sure coach Gettler feels I should score some goals in the next three years. I just want to be a solid player and outplay my opponent. If you do that, we'll win."

The Minutemen will be looking for a win to set the school seasonal record today at Harvard at 2 p.m.

Key matches ahead for UMass volleyball

Spikers face Springfield tonight

By ROGER CHAPMAN
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts volleyball team wanted to get a monkey off their back last weekend by winning the MAIAW state tournament and getting their first state championship. But Eastern Nazaren University found a way to chain the monkey to the spikers backs as UMass lost to Eastern Nazerene in the finals 11-15, 13-15, 7-15.

"We just did not play well," said coach Elaine Sortino. "We didn't pass well, we didn't block, and we didn't pick off balls on our attack. Because of that we never got into our offense."

The spikers did beat the University of Lowell 13-15, 15-10, 15-9 to earn a spot in the finals against Eastern Nazarene. The loss against Eastern Nazarene does not affect the playoff situation for the spikers, however. The Minutemen are ranked fourth in the northeast with a 25-13 mark. The latest poll comes out this morning with not much of a change expected.

The Minutemen did suffer more than just a loss, however. Senior Co-captain Patti Grant, who has led the spikers all season, sustained a minor ankle injury in the second game against Eastern Nazerene. An Eastern Nazerene player crossed under the net and landed on Grant's ankle on a block attempt. Grant is expected to play in tonight's crucial match at Springfield College.

Injuries have also hampered junior Co-captain Sally Maher. Maher, who leads the Minutemen offensively, has been nagged by ankle and knee injuries over the last couple of weeks.

Sortino does not expect her strategy to change against Springfield, despite the injuries.

"Patti's injury makes a little difference in the right side blocking because she is taller than Susie (Grant)," said Sortino. "The whole offense will have to contribute to take some of the pressure off Sally. They are going to be keying on her."

The spikers met the Chiefs twice last year winning both meetings. UMass won a regular season match in five games and also defeated Springfield in the ECAC championship game in three straight. But Sortino was cautious about such an easy repeat performance.

"Last year's wins don't mean a thing," said Sortino. "It's going to be a well played game. Whoever comes to play is going to take it. We will give it our best shot."

The playoff implications in this game are high. Springfield is ranked fifth in the Northeast and a win tonight would, no doubt, put the Chiefs in the crucial number four spot.

"Only four teams from the combined Northeast and Mid-Atlantic regions will go to the ECAC tournament," said Sortino. "We are in a good spot because the University of New Haven won't be there, so there is one spot open."

Vermont sinks swimmers

By GERRY deSIMAS
Collegian Staff

"They took us by surprise. We expected to go up there and win," rookie University of Massachusetts women's swimming coach Bob Newcomb said after Saturday's 73-67 season-opening loss to the University of Vermont in Burlington, VT.

The UMass loss came despite three first place performances by senior Elizabeth Feinberg and double wins by sophomore Allison Cozzo and freshman Julie Wilkins. UMass beat Vermont 80-60 last year.

"We won a majority of races," Newcomb said. "But they were very ready and excited and they had a few more freshmen than we did."

The meet came down to the last relay race, the 400 meter freestyle. UVM led the Minutemen by one, 67-66 and the Catamounts took the race and the meet by outsprinting UMass at the end.

"Our sprinting, other than Liz, was a problem," Newcomb said. Feinberg was winner in the 50 meter freestyle, 100 free and 200 free races.

McKay quits Tampa Bay, goes to front office

Was club's only coach for nine seasons

TAMPA, Fla. (AP) — John McKay, the only coach in the nine-year history of the Tampa Bay Buccaneers, announced Monday he will resign at the end of the season.

His resignation leaves only Tom Landry of the Dallas Cowboys, Don Shula of the Miami Dolphins and Chuck Noll of the Pittsburgh Steelers as coaches with longer careers with the same National Football League team.

McKay, who amassed a 127-40-8 record during 16 years with Southern California, will become the Bues' president at the end of the 1984 season, the club announced.

At Southern Cal, McKay led the Trojans to nine Pac-8 championships and to eight Rose Bowls. But with the Bues, McKay's record is only 41-85-1, including a 3-7 mark this season.

His Bues have made the play-offs three of the past five years, but have won only five of their last 26 games.

McKay cited the team's performance and his health in his resignation to owner Hugh

Reagan wins in landslide

WASHINGTON(AP)—President Reagan swept to runaway re-election over Walter F. Mondale Tuesday night, but Republicans struggled to translate his landslide into significant gains in Congress.

Mondale conceded defeat, telephoned his congratulations to Reagan and told cheering supporters in St. Paul, Minn., "He has won. We are all Americans; he is our president and we honor him tonight."

The GOP renewed its control of the Senate, even if by a reduced margin, and were gaining in the House. But Democrats successfully battled against the Reagan tide in district after district to protect their large majority.

The president's victory was convincing; he and Vice President George Bush came close to the 50-state sweep they sought. Mondale won the District of Columbia and claimed victory in his home state of Minnesota.

Reagan won 37 states with 381 electoral votes, led in 7 more with with 89. In the Associated Press count, the electoral votes of South Dakota pushed his total past the 270 majority mark.

Mondale's running mate, Geraldine Ferraro, hailed Mondale in a concession from New York City, saying he won another battle—"That battle for equal opportunity... he opened a door that will never be closed again" by naming her first woman on a national ticket.

Sen. Paul Laxalt, Reagan's campaign chairman, said, "We've got at least a reasonable chance to have the most historic landslide in all American history."

No matter what the margin, Mondale told his supporters, "I'm at peace with the knowledge that I gave it everything I've got."

"This fight didn't end tonight," he said.

Mondale praised Ms. Ferraro and said, "We didn't win, but we made history and that fight has just begun."

The president got news of his victory in Los Angeles, where he and his wife watched the returns in a Century Plaza Hotel suite equipped with four television sets.

He told reporters he hoped to participate in a summit with the Soviet Union during a second term in office.

The president insisted all day he was superstitiously avoiding predictions, but felt confident enough to outline his goals for a second term in an interview with the Washington Post. He said he would push again for congressional approval of a balanced budget amendment to the Constitution and the right to veto individual sections of spending bills, two measures he wants to help reduce federal spending.

He also renewed his call for a defense system in space designed to shoot down missles.

With votes counted in 48 percent of the precincts, Reagan was polling 58 percent to 41 for Mondale.

The largest popular vote in history belonged to Lyndon Johnson, elected with 61.05 percent of the vote in 1964.

Kerry prevails over Shamie

BOSTON (AP) - John F. Kerry, a liberal Democrat, defied a nationwide conservative voting trend in Tuesday's voting for an open U.S. Senate seat from Massachusetts as he defeated Ray Shamie.

"I feel wonderful," a weary Kerry said in a brief television interview with Democratic Sen. Paul Tsongas, whose retirement opened the Senate seat.

With 662 of 2,196 precincts, or 30 percent, reporting, Kerry led with 371,847 votes, or 58 percent, while Shamie had 268,492 votes, or 42 percent.

The margin was comparable to the 61-39 percent defeat veteran Sen. Edward M. Kennedy handed Shamie when the Republicn was a virtual political unknown in his first race.

Kerry ran well throughout the state and had little trouble in winning the right to succeed the retiring Tsongas and keeping the seat Democratic.

"I believe that this race gave Massachusetts a real choice about the future. And the results speak loudly about which direction this great commonwealth of ours wants to move in," Kerry

GOP solidifies Senate control

Studds, Conte win House contests

WASHINGTON (AP) - Republicans retained control of the U.S. Senate on Tuesday, but not without some casualties as Democrats chalked up enough victories to prevent President Reagan's landslide from translating into a GOP rout in that chamber.

In the Senate, Democrats sought to narrow a 55-45 GOP majority.

The Democrats' best hope was in Tennessee, where Rep. Albert Gore Jr. was favored to claim a seat being vacated by Senate Majority Leader Howard Baker.

Republican incumbents Roger Jepsen in Iowa, Charles Percy of Illinois and Jesse Helms of North Carolina found themselves in close contests.

Helms, a leader of the New Right, won a third term Tuesday by defeating Gov. Jim Hunt, a moderate Democrat, after a bitter campaign that saw the two spend more than $22 million in the costliest Senate race in history.

In the House, where Democrats hold a 266-167 edge, with two vacancies, it was the Republicans who were looking to gain ground.

Combined with the support of conservative Democrats, that kind of GOP advance would give the president a "working majority" for his second-term legislation.

Massachusetts Democratic leaders predicted a sweep of all 11 congressional districts except the 1st District in western Massachusetts, where GOP incumbent Silvio Conte is considered strong.

House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., seeking his 17th and final term in Congress, and censured U.S. Rep. Gerry Studds were expected to lead the Democratic sweep.

Studds held a 20-point lead late Tuesday in his first election since he was censured in Congress for a 1973 homosexual affair with a teen-age page.

Studds, a Democrat, faced Republican Lewis Crampton, a former Environmental Protection Agency official who was a boyhood friend of Studds' in suburban Cohasset.

With 39 percent of the vote tallied, Studds led Crampton 60 percent to 40 percent.

Amherst voters go Democratic

Fluoridation also approved

Amherst residents voted for the Democratic Party down the line in Tuesday's national elections.

Amherst voters also decided to support the town health department decision to fluoridate town drinking water to prevent tooth decay. The vote was 6,901 to 4,497 in favor of fluoridation, according to Pamela Robinson of the Amherst Town Clerk's office.

Amherst voters went against the tide in the state and most of the nation by voting for Democratic challengers Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro over President Ronald Reagan and Vice President George Bush by a nearly three-to-one margin. Voters also favored Democratic Lt. Gov. John Kerry over Republican businessman Raymond Shamie by an even bigger margin.

Mondale and Ferraro recieved 9,830 votes to 3,972 for Reagan and Bush, Robinson said. Massachusetts Independent Alliance candidates Dennis Serrette and Nancy Ross recieved 36 votes, Robinson said.

Kerry received 10,107 votes, over Shamie's 3,178, Robinson said.

And University of Massachusetts Everywoman's Center founder Mary Wentworth won Amherst over incumbent Republican Silvio Conte, although Conte won western Massachusetts for re-election to his 13th term in the U.S. House of Representatives. Wentworth received 7,537 votes in Amherst, over Conte's 5,625.

In the race for the Third Hampshire Distriet seat in the Massachusetts Legislature, incumbent Democrat Jim Collins won Amherst with 9,911 votes, over Republican challenger Mary Ann Foley of Granby, who received 3,188 votes in Amherst.

State Senator John Olver (D-Amherst), running unopposed for re-election, received 10,185 votes in Amherst, Robinson said. There were no write-in votes for that position, she said.

Sikh protection demanded

NEW DELHI, India (AP) A week after Indira Gandhi's assassination, opposition political and religious leaders told the new government the situation was "still serious" throughout much of India and urged firm action to protect Sikhs from marauding Hindus.

A Sikh leader said thousands of Sikhs had been killed.

Indian army troops kept peace in New Delhi and other major cities, where Hindu mobs had ransacked Sikh shops and homes in a four-day frenzy of killing and destruction. The violence broke out after Mrs. Gandi's assassination Wednesday by two men identified as Sikh members of her security staff.

The United News of India said two of the senior police officers responsible for Mrs. Gandhi's security G.R. Gupta deputy commissioner fo police, and D.C. Gulia, the assistant commissioner had been suspended pending completion of an investigation into her killing.

U.S. -Soviet nuke talks begin

WASHINGTON (AP) The United States and the Soviet Union have agreed to hold talks in Moscow beginning Nov. 28 on controlling the spread of nuclear weapons and technology to other nations, an administration official said Tuesday.

The talks are the fourth in a series that began in December 1982.

Beyond that, the official said, there are no immediate plans for high-level contacts between the two superpowers on arms control.

Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei A. Gromyko met here in late September with President Reagan and Secretary of State George P. Shultz.

During the visit, the official said, the administration raised the possibility of another meeting between Shultz and Gromyko, but it has not panned out.

The United States and the Soviet Union are among 126 countries that are parties to the 1968 treaty designed to curb the spread of nuclear weapons.

Graduate Student Senate grants loan to heating co-op

By SEAN CASEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Graduate Student Senate last night granted a loan to the Off Campus Housing Office for help in starting its heating oil coop, and denied a funding request by the Student Controlled Businesses (SCB) to send a graduate employee of the People's Market to attend a conference on cooperative business management.

The senate voted also to increase its budget for funding events because requests have doubled in two years.

The Off Campus Housing Office request to aid in publicizing and coordinating the fuel cooperative which would be run in conjunction with Massachusetts Fair Share.

The senate voted to allocate $1000 out of its reserve as a loan to the co-op, half of which would be paid back in each of the next two years.

The co-op will provide oil at reduced rates to off-campus students.

The Student Controlled Businesses (SCB) request to send a graduate employee of the People's Market to a conference on cooperative businesses along with workers from several other SCB's was voted down by the senate

The conference would have concentrated on building business skills of the student workers. Earth Foods needed a $10,000 grant before it could open this semester.

The senate voted last night to increase the $7,000 ad-hoc funding budget by $2000 since the senate has spent half of these funds, which are supposed to carry the senate through the spring semester.

The senate allocated the money from its cash reserve, which stands at $50,000. It could increase since it is contingent on the number of fee-paying graduate students, a number which the senate is not sure of, said senate treasurer Al Huettner.

"We seem to be getting more fee paying students than we expected, so we are pretty well off financially," Huettner said.

Huettner explained that funding requests have increased from 16 in the 1982-83 school year to 30 last year, and the senate has already had 14 requests the first semester of this year.

"Maybe word had gotten around that the Graduate senate is giving away money, and that's why we're getting more requests," Huettner said.

Half the money allocated last night will go to replace $1000 dollars spent from this year's budget by last year's senate.

D.C. meals donated to Oxfam

By JOANN WILLIAMS
Collegian Correspondent

University officials have found a way around the law prohibiting students from donating dining commons meals to Oxfam America, by having students sign a release card.

"Students will have to fill out an Oxfam rebate card in addition to telling the cashier they want to fast," Daniel Stockford, the president of the UMass Hunger Task Force said.

Representatives of the Task Force, which coordinates the annual Oxfam America Fast for a World Harvest, said officials are using this alternative to conduct the fast this year.

The Board of Trustees, which does not meet until Dec. 5, will have to vote on the law prohibiting the donation of trust funds to charity. The dining commons operate on a trust fund account through student meal plan fees.

The law was discovered last semester when the Southwest Area Government tried to work out a rebate plan during Hunger Awareness Week. Last week it was reported that students could not donate a meal to Oxfam, an organization dedicated to combatting world hunger, because of that law.

"The cards are actual formal written contracts which give the university a record of the student's donations," Stockford explained.

"We're really excited about this," Stockford said. "We're glad we can hold the fast again this year."

The fast will be held Thursday, Nov. 15 during dinner and students may sign up next week, Tuesday breakfast through Thursday lunch.

"It's important that they give up their Thursday dinner only, or it won't go to Oxfam," Stockford warned. "Sometimes students sign up but eat that night anyway if they have extra meals," he said.

Olver addresses SGA

By BOB BURGESS
Collegian Staff

State Sen. John Olver will present an overview of yesterday's election results tonight to the Undergraduate Student Senate, including how University of Massachusetts students may be affected by elections in the legislature.

Also addressing the senate will be Fern L. Johnson, associate provost for undergraduate education who will discuss a general education proposal to be voted on tomorrow by the faculty senate. If passed, C,D, and E core requirements would be replaced with "social world,""biological and physical world," and "analytical reasoning." Students would be required to take specific courses in these areas and if the faculty approves it, the bill would become effective beginning with the incoming class of 1986.

Olver, who ran unopposed for re-election as state senator from Amherst yesterday, is expected to discuss the state's higher education budget and how funds will be affected by having more Democrats or Republicans in the state legislature.

Kathleen Merrigian, an Olver administrative aide, said yesterday this is the senator's first visit to campus this semester, and that the student senate had invited him. Merrigian also said a question and answer period will follow Olver's presentation.

University administrators have been working on the general education proposal for eight months, and Johnson's address tonight will be the first official plan presentation to the student body.

The senate will also vote tonight on whether to establish an advisory board which would suggest "receive complaints from individual students and student groups regarding the showing of a specific film."

According to the motion on the senate agenda, this is aimed at films which show the brutalization, dehumanization, or sexual degradation of any class of people.

S.E. Chase, a member of the Women's Issues Team, said yesterday that the advisory board would be a "common ground" for people who object to the showing of a certain movie to meet with the group showing the movie. Chase said the board would be "another form of education," and not a censor attempt.

Peer conselors will listen

By TAARA EDEN HOFFMAN
Collegian Staff

People "personally influenced" by gay and lesbian issues should feel comfortable discussing them, according to members of the Lesbian, Gay, and Bisexual Counseling Collective at the University of Massachusetts.

The most important aspect of the collective is that "we exist", Tammy Boots, one of the peer counselors in the collective said.

"People are oppressed by invisibility...having people know we're there with a sympathetic ear" is important to the UMass community, Boots said.

The peer counselors are trained at the beginning of each semester to help people "be at ease with themselves and other people, and what's going on around them," Boots said.

People not only talk about homosexuality, but all issues that concern them, according to collective member Kathleen Offenhartz.

"People who come talk to us are quite capable of making themselves happy," member Leslie Powers said.

"It's seems like magic. They hear themselves and (understand) what concerns them," Powers said.

Everyone in the counseling collective has to deal with some form of oppression, so the peer counselors understand the concerns and needs of oppressed groups, according to Felice Yeske, gay and lesbian awareness programmer on the East side of campus.

There are currently two Spanish speaking peer counselors in the collective.

"We'd like to reach out to the Hispanic-gay community to make (people) feel comfortable, to say 'we speak Spanish, we speak your language'," according to a collective member.

The collective holds "rap groups" on Wednesday evenings at 7:30 in SU 413B, to which all members of the UMass community are invited.

Tonight's topic is "Bisexuality," and future topics include "Coming Out to Roomates, Parents," "Lesbians and Gay men: Similarities and Differences," and "Butch/Fem Stereotypes."

UM learns culinary creations

By MARY CRESSE
Collegian Staff

Mollie Fitzgerald recalls her one and only culinary horror: "Well, I was making the fruit frappe, you know, on this cable tv show I have at Duke? I'd put the apples and the bananas in the blender okay, but the mellons were sticking out on top? So I stuck in the wooden spoon to push them in and the next thing you know, it got caught. Splinters all over. And I couldn't even fake it, I had to go on."

The Duke University senior and author of the On Campus Cookbook looked embarrassed for the first time all afternoon while giving demonstrations of recipes.

The people in front of the University Store were wondering just what was going on, but didn't seem to care once they found the free artichoke dip, crackers, and onion rings. They liked the frappe (sans splinters, naturally), but too many of them didn't seem to linger and find out just why she was there.

This didn't seem to bother Fitzgerald, as she sliced, diced, mixed, and baked for three hours while explaining to the bulging-mouthed people, who did stay, just what she was up to.

"Look, I'm a college student. I dislike dorm food as much as anyone else. I had lived in a dorm room for three years—in a triple, mind you, if that wasn't insane—and believe me, I know what it's like to want to eat normal food once in a while."

So she put together 128 pages of recipes catering to college students and our distinct culinary habits (i.e. crazy cravings at 3 a.m.; food to bring to reservoir parties, etc.).

Released by Workman Publishing (the same people who brought you The Preppy Handbook), On Campus Cookbook is really a guide for cooking in dorm rooms or suites or other places where there is little or no refrigeration or storage space. After completing three years of taste-testing, and a year and a half of digging publishers, Fitzgerald came out with the guide, including recipes for whole dinners, weekend breakfasts, munchies, or low-cal things like fruit salads, vegetable hors'douevres, and take-along potato salads and the like.

"I realize that in dorm rooms you're not supposed to cook, but you know as I do that we all do it anyway, and what I'm trying to do is share some ideas I've had while at the same time trying to show people who might be afraid of cooking that it's really easy." Then, "Well it's better that the food hall, isn't it?"

Yes, Mollie, anything is better than the D.C.

New fence torn down outside Curry Hicks Cage

Vandals ripped down a newly constructed fence outside of the Curry Hicks Cage Monday night and University of Massachusetts police are warning students to keep away from the area because construction has started on the athletic building.

Gerald O'Neil, director of Public Safety, said the torn-down fence was discovered yesterday morning, and rather than walk around the fence, people were walking over it.

"It's a danger with construction and everything. We have a fear that people might get hurt. We're asking people to take alternative routes (aroun the building)," O'Neil said.

Construction is expected to last one year on renovations of the Cage.

Fire dept. finds smoke, no fire

Five Amherst Fire Department trucks responded to a report of a fire in a first floor room in Chadbourne House at 5:40 p.m. yesterday.

Chadbourne residents were evacuated for 30 minutes after other residents smelled smoke and notified fourth-floor resident assistant Kathryn Mahoney, who discovered the room filled with smoke after obtaining a key from the cluster office. The occupants of the room were not present at the time.

Captain George Bowler of the Amherst Fire Department said faulty wiring in a fan was responsible for the heavy smoke, but no fire was present. He said the fire department responded to the call as if it was a regular fire because of the heavy smoke that was reported.

Fire officials turned off the electricity "and then it was just a matter of finding out what caused the smoke," Bowler said.

In addition to the fire trucks, two University of Massachusetts police cars responded to the alarm. The majority of the residents were not re-admitted to the building until the smoke had dissipated at 6:10 p.m.

Money stolen from dorm; dump truck window smashed

Two hundred and ninety dollars in cash was reported stolen from an unlocked room on the fourth floor of Washington dormitory, police said. The theft occured between 6:45 p.m. and 11:59 p.m. Saturday and there is a suspect in the theft.

A 19-year old Amherst man was arrested on Massachusetts Avenue at 1:48 a.m. Tuesday and charged with driving his motorcycle while intoxicated, police reported. Police reported the man was driving 55-60 miles per hour in a 30 mph zone.

A state owned dump truck parked near Fisher Laboratory had its windshield and roof light smashed, causing $350 in damage, police reported. Police said the vandalism occured between Nov. 4 and Nov. 5.

A video machine in Greenough basement was broken into, and its front glass panel was broken, causing an undetermined amount of damage, police said. The vandalism occured between 2 a.m. and 8 a.m. on Monday and reported at 3:57 that afternoon.

in," Kerry said. "What the people of Massachusetts said in this Senate race is we emphatically reject the politics of selfishness.

"We reject the notion that women must be treated as second class citizens. We reject the idea that we cannot halt the nuclear arms race and we reject the extension of that race into outer space. And finally I think we all join in rejecting the simplistic slogans that masquerade as solutions to very difficult and complex problems," he said.

Shamie conceded the Senate race at 10:25 p.m., saying he had brought new life to the long dormant Republican Party in the state.

"All of you tonight who believe in individual freedom, celebrate tonight with us a new beginning. We have ignited a chain reaction of truth that will give this state two-party competition, that will very soon give us victory after victory," Shamie said, adding he was undecided about his political future.

Shamie, who owns two high technology firms, has poured at least $2.2 million of his own money since 1982 into his campaigns.

However, Shamie called his defeat "a new beginning" and in his concession 2 1?2 hours after the polls closed he added:

"When you are handed defeat, we accept it as a challenge to win a much larger victory...What you see tonight is the foreshadowing of a victory that can't be held back."

Gathering protests corporate oppression

By DEBORAH NEUBAUER
Collegian Correspondent

Bringing to public attention the "world of violence and oppression" perpetuated by multi national corporations is the goal of local women who are organizing the "Not In Our Name" resistance action to take place in New York City, on Nov. 18 and 19, according to resistance organizer Cathe O'Connor.

"Not in our Name" is a group of individual women gathered together to sound the alarm across the United States. We are united to bring to people's attention the effect the multi-national corporations are having upon members of the Third World, women and people of all color in the United States and all over the world," O'Connor said.

The women involved in the resistance action are primarily those who first gathered in the Pentagon action of 1981 to protest the build-up of nuclear arms, she said.

The Pentagon action was the first public display of outrage over the connection between the profit of the multi-national corporations and the oppression in the world she said.

The gathering of women started in Northampton, and now has bases in New York, Rochester New York, Seneca N.Y. Syracuse, Philadelphia, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Boston, and Western Mass.

Their constitution states, "Each day the white men in power make decisions in the name of the people of the United States. Their choices greate a world of violence and oppression. These decisions are based on the desires of these men to increase their power and wealth. They say it's in our name.

"We say it's not in our name. We look toward a society that is equality based, free from oppression, and which guarantees fulfillment of basic needs and a safe future for all people of the world."

On Nov. 18, and 19, "Not in our name" is organizing a march through the streets of New York City "To protest these multi-national corporations who profit off the oppression and exploitation of workers, environmental destruction and violence against women. The message the gathering of women will send is one of alarm and awareness O'Connor said.

The women's resistance action will target specific corporations such as Upjohn, which manufactures the non FDA approved contraceptive, Depo-Provera.

Also targeted are CitiCorps, General Electric and Harper and Row publishers, she said.

Honor program hosts UM awareness day

The University Honors Program will host an awareness day in the Campus Center Concourse from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. today in order to familiaraize students with the program.

Honors students who are sophomores and upper classmen will be at a table to tell interested students what the program is offering, and its requirements. There will be two groups of advisors giving information on the Departmental Honors Program and the University Honors Program. Lauren Segalla, an advisor, said "We hope to eliminate fear among students thinking about taking the courses."

The program just beeame a Registered Student Organization in order to acquire funds so they could maintain a budget, Segalla said.

Meyers 'joke' uncalled for

Last Friday afternoon at about 5:30, a friend and I decided to go into the Bluewall for a drink. Cliff Meyers was the "entertainment." In the half hour between when I walked in and the end of his show, he aimed a flashlight at and ridiculed a woman he thought was flat-chested, made a string of "gang-bang" jokes, and shined the light on and laughed at a woman in the front who was getting upset with his "jokes." The worst came when he said, "We have a Portugese woman in front here—someone bring on the pool table."

After the show, I went up to Meyers and tried to speak with him. Without getting too political (I figured that with him it was useless) or too personal (I think his guitar playing is lousy and his singing is worse), I explained that I thought his jokes were offensive, and that it was exploitive and outrageous for him to make a joke out of gang-rape. Meyers told me he believes many people think "gang-bang" jokes are funny, and that his show isn't "geared" to people like me, and that if I don't like it, I should just stay home. Then he asked me if I was Portugese. I told him no, but the comments he made were infuriating to me and probably to many others. Meyers just said I was being "irrational" and refused to discuss it any further.

I think it is time that other entertainment be brought into the Bluewall. I am not suggesting that Cliff Meyers be banned from the Bluewall entirely, but the bar management, and others responsible for bringing entertainment into the Bluewall, should take a stand in saying that the kinds of comments Meyers was making last Friday are intolerable, and that if he wants to continue playing in the Bluewall, he should clean up his act. If Meyers has to continue stooping that low just to get a cheap laugh, maybe he should face the fact that it is time to retire.

Zappa good

Frank Zappa's appearances at the Fine Arts Center were "a good time." It was not however, such a good time to read the review of the shows in the Collegian. A little accuracy please. Arthur Barrow is one of the regular Zappa bassists, not a crew member. Scott Tunes, not "Al Tunis" plays bass on this tour.

More importantly, what about the second show, which was certainly a financial disaster for UPC, but a much more intimate show for the crowd of 300 people? Wasn't it at all interesting to readers that Archie Shepp played with the band, as well as on "Tied to the Whipping Post," what Zappa called "conceptual history"?

Why not enlighten readers on the diversity of audience participants? What kind of people attend such a show? I spoke with one older man, who was over 40, who said that he used to see Zappa in jazz bars in New York City, and had always been fascinated by what he had to say, not to mention his musical imagination and flexibility.

Here is an artist who has survived. He is a survivor and an apostrophizing voice in the midst of an even larger heap of swill. He is not just "wierdness." What is he saying about us? Indeed.

And what does a review like the one in the Collegian say about readers and what they like to hear? No, he did not bite the heads of bats or torture gerbils. What he does say and do are things we might not want to hear or see. That is because he is often using us as objects of his castigation. But all of this is rejected as wierdness. Too bad. He's right again.

Most people do smoke what is in their college degrees. It really gets you out there.

OPINION

The opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the university unless otherwise noted.

It doesn't end here

Election 1984 is over.

Ronald Reagan has won overwhelmingly and will be President of this nation for the next four years.

Today, we must all remember that once the euphoria or disappointment following the election has passed the political process goes on.

We must not forget the issues in 1985, or the years beyond. We must continue to fight for what we believe to be right and fair for all of America.

We must continue to let those in office know how we stand on the issues that confront us and our future.

We are the generation that has been talked about throughout this campaign. It is our future, and our children's future that will be most affected by the next four and the next forty years.

It is crucial that we lay claim to that future and help to shape it. One man does not lead a nation, we all do. We must send the message to Washington that we, as the youth of America will take an active role in our and America's future.

We must not only send that message once every four years, we must send it each day, by holding rallies, writing letters, calling our representatives in Washington, by actively participating in the democratic process. We must do it today, tomorrow, every day.

The threat from within
Thomas Pitoniak

Since this is my ninth and last semester here at the university, I feel pretty much at home. But before this semester I never had a class in Dickinson, home of the police and ROTC. Having to visit there three times a week, however, has made me more aware of a great national tragedy. The martial atmosphere in that building triggers in my mind a series of thoughts in regard to the mentality of too many college students. It's a sad situation.

After I enter the building, aiming for Latin, I step within the sights of a glass case filled with military pitures. Above the jets with names like "NATO Code Name Foxbat" is the crowning glory: "Countering the Threat." This attitude, for me, sums up the successful brainwashing of masses of people, some of whom can't remember the daily death counts in Vietnam flashing behind Huntley and Brinkley. Do they care about today's tragedies?

Alexander Orcullo was an editor for the opposition Mindanao Current in the Phillipines. Last Thursday, he and his wife were stopped by armed terrorists in Davao City. He was dragged away and murdered. Is it a coincidence that the critic, probably outspoken, was silenced in a country that happens to be run by guns? Even given our concern for the investment climate to suit our needs, our support of this unpopular, unjust regime is shortsighted. Turmoil is beneficial only to those who win or have the guns. Or sell the guns. Your best defense is defense.

The Reagan Revolution has made macho intransigence seem infinitely superior to "wimpy" concern for peace—the real stuff and not the flimsy kind that supposedly results from more weapons. I believe more weapons will only lead to more death. The living, breathing life is more valuable than the clanking, crashing, and irradiating mechanics of destruction. People love to snicker when I tell them I'm an English major. It doesn't matter. It's what I do because I genuinely love the subject. I'll have to work hard, but I won't be searching for personal fulfillment in the nose-cone of the Peace-maker.

Young people rally around Reagan's image because it's the thing to do. There are too many clones who are joining Reagan's team, forsaking ideals for thoughts of a much less troublesome BMW. The ideals are relegated to the trunk. Trendiness has not only conquered reality, for some it alone is real. Balloons and train rides occupy a greater position in the national psyche than acid rain, for example. Does anyone else sense a vacuum where leadership and initiative should be? The only studies the Administration acknowledges are the ones that exist as excuses for inaction. They suppress their own reports, which point to the need for immediate action, and corrupt the integrity of the EPA. Acid rain belongs with apartheid—back in the trunk of imagined problems.

Mondale has recognized our problems as real. If he lost, it will be because of the apathetic and the illiberals, too blind to see that we need to counter some threats from within. A local columnist speaks of the "ruthless" Sandinistas, but forgets that Al Haig tried to convince people that the four nuns murdered in 1980 by the Salvadoran national guard had crashed a gate. Isn't our textbook for terror in Nicaragua a bit ruthless, and totally undemocratic? With a semblance of separation from this dirty business, Reagan beams into the great American living room like a harmless old man.

Many of us are merely in stride with the trend toward sanctioned selfishness. For some, college is a job training first and a wholesome enrichment by accident or not at all. Taxes and social programs are the unwanted burdens of Big Government. But defense is a blessing, no matter what a light bulb costs. Peace through strength is actually wealth through war. Get a job in Groton and, as the ad says, your ship is in. Join the Gipper's team, and we'll counter that threat if it kills us.

Another time, another place
K. Arvind

It has happened again. It was Indira Priyadarshini Gandhi this time. The Prime Minister of India, known to millions of Indians as 'Amma' (mother) was killed by the bullets of two mad men. That same mad element in the human psyche, which took away Abraham Lincoln, John Kennedy, Martin Luther King and Mahatma Gandhi from us, has struck again. Ironically this despicable crime of violence has taken place in the land of Mahatma Gandhi and the victim was also a Gandhi (not related to the Mahatma).

Wednesday morning, I woke up to hear this shocking piece of news. The television was full of it. I watched with horror and sadness the reactions of some people of Indian origin interviewed on the media making such disgusting comments like "We feel exactly the same way that Jews in Germany felt when Hitler died." These comments were of course by Sikhs, the more extremist among them. There were saner reactions too like that of the Indian Ambassador in the United States who said "India will still continue to be friendly and affectionate to the Sikhs." The reaction of most Indians in UMass is one of shock and disbelief.

Since a lot of readers are not likely to be aware of the background behind this assassination, a brief explanation is in order. Punjab is a state in North-western India. it is the home land of the Sikhs, a religious minority in India. The religion that they follow is known as Sikhism. For quite some time the Sikhs have been agitating against allegedly unfair treatment and discrimination. The agitation was localized to the Punjab. The discontent among the Sikhs gave rise to a militant and intolerant section among them. They demanded that an independent and Sovereign state—Khalistan—be created to protect Sikh interests. This movement derived moral and financial support from wealthy Sikhs living in Canada, the United States, Great Britain and Australia. This militancy among a paritcular group of Sihks resulted in large scale violence in the Punjab. Looting and murder became daily news. Some prominent academicians and journalists who were known not to concur with the extremist Sikhs were murdered in cold blood. Communal riots resulted in the death of Sikhs and Hindus in large numbers. The once peaceful Punjab became a battle field. The most prominent militant Sikh leader was Mr. Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale. He lived with his band of followers in the Golden Temple in Amritsar, the holiest shrine of the Sikhs and directed the Sikh agitation from there. Arms and ammunition were amassed on a large scale inside the Golden Temple which is supposed to be a place of worship. (Some of the weapons retrieved from the Golden Temple were shown on the Indian Television. They were heavy arms which normally would be used only in a war.) Seeing no solution, Mrs. Gandhi's Government declared an emergency in the Punjab and handed over the Punjab administration to the armed forces. In June, after repeated warnings to the extremists in the Golden Temple went unheeded, the army acted and committed the terrible act of sacrilege—it marched into the golden Temple and captured it. A lot of blood was spilt. Mr. Bhindrawale was killed in the operation. This action shocked Sikhs in India and all over the world. The Sikhs were angry at Indira and her son Rajiv (the new Prime Minister of India) and held them responsible for the violation of the sanctity of their holiest shrine. Many of them wanted revenge. A spate of hijackings by extremist Sikhs brought world attention to the Sikh agitation. Ever since Indira and Rajiv had been living under a threat of assassination. The security around the Prime Minister was too tight to permit penetration by any assassin from outside. As fate would have it, she was killed by two of her own security men who were Sikhs.

Nobody can claim that Indira was perfect. She had all the unavoidable characteristics of a politician. Some even doubt her faith in democracy and allege that she tried to perpetrate dynastic rule in India. But there were better things about her too. She was the only stabilizing factor in the politics of the world's largest democracy. The country has no other leader of her stature who could lead it. In a nation which has 14 official languages and umpteen religions she was the only leader known in every nook and corner of the country. Above all she was a woman—she was walking proof of the truth that women are in no way inferior to men. She was symbolic of the triumph over evil of discrimination on the basis of sex. She was the boldest leader that India has produced. There was a joke that used to go around New Delhi that characterized Indira as "the only man in her Government." Her boldness sometimes made her appear reckless as in the way she handled the Punjab agitation.

Now Indira is no more. I am still unable to believe it. A great woman that India has borne has been killed by a band of mad men. Womankind has lost one of its brilliant representatives. It is a moment of sadness for all humanity for the immoral act of violence against a human being has been successfully committed once again. This moment, I as an Indian have the same feelings that Americans felt when President Kennedy fell victim to a similar act of insanity.

Stats and more stats

I think it should be a requirement for people who write to the Collegian and site vague facts and figures, to have at least two semesters of statistics before they start using numbers that imply extreme accuracy.

Liisa Trocki's letter in last Wednesday's Collegian was a prime example. Liisa informed us that 66 percent of the women in this country have been or will be raped in their lifetime. Did Liisa take a Sabbatical from her job as Women's Leadership Project Coordinator and go around the U.S. asking each and every woman if she had been raped, or expected to be raped in the future, then tabulated the results to come up with this figure of 66 percent? Also, even if this figure were correct, is this directly correlated to the male population, ie 66 percent of them are or will be rapists? Or do some men rape, or intend to rape more than one woman, making the ratio of rapists (men) to victim (women) smaller?

It's interesting Liisa, in that rushing to prove that "the number of men who rape is much greater than men care to think" you are able to imply extreme accuracy by using a figure like two-thirds, or 66 percent.

I hate to disillusion you, but citing that type of accuracy to something as variable as human behavior, especially to events that haven't occurred yet (ie will be raped) is statistical hogwash, regardless of where you read it or imagined it. It's ironic that this letter appeared in the "Joke" issue of the Collegian.

Silly fun

AMERICAN DREAMER
Directed by Rick Rosenthal
Starring JoBeth Williams and Tom Conti
At the Hampshire Mall

By RENEE BACHER
Collegian Staff

"American Dreamer" is a light-hearted slapstick comedy that is silly and predictable, yet nonetheless enjoyable.

Cathy Palmer (Joheth Williams) is an oppressd suburban housewife, with a little fantasy lurking around in her head. She enters a contest to win a free trip to Paris by writing the end of the latest "Rebecca Ryan" trashy detective novel. Cathy wins the contest and joyfully informs her husband (Tom Conti) that they are on their way to Paris together. He in turn informs her that they are not, in fact, on their w ay to Paris together because he is too busy at the offiee. Palmer's husband, played by Tom Conti, is more of a conservative phenomenon than a character.

So, off goes Cathy Palmer, against her husband's wishes, to Paris. Once there, she is involved in an accident, suffers a case of amnesia, and believes she is the fictional heroine of her novel, Rebecca Ryan.

Williams, as Cathy Rebecca is outrageously zany, and melodramatic. She was well cast in her role. Even the most trite of farces she manages to pull off with a comically classy flair. Her partner in crime, actor GianCarlo Gianni is also quite good. He comes off as a delightful combination of Dudley Moore, Dustin Hoffman, and Al Paccino.

The film has a story book ending and a Walt Disney feel to it yet it's worth a good hard chuckle.

THE ROYAL WINNIPEG BALLET
At the Fine Arts Center
Monday, November 5

By WENDY LEWIS
Collegian Correspondent

Canada's Royal Winnipeg Ballet gave the full house at the FAC a good excuse to forget about the election for two and one half hours Monday night.

The selections that ranged from a Tchaikovsky score choreographed by George Balanchine to a funky interpretation of an Eric Clapton song proved that ballet can entertain on a classical and on a popular level.

During the first two-thirds of the performance the company proved its technical prowess more traditionally. In "Allegro Brillante" the female dancer seemed too powerful to need to be guided by her partner. Their movements were framed by other members who supported them with synchronic movement to the changing tempo of the music. The light and airy costumes, simply designed, helped to focus attention on the movement.

In a spectacular pas de deux the male dancer (bedecked with a ruby-studded outfit that offset his remarkable musculature) defied gravity by thrusting his powerful body into the air in a series of dramatic leaps; his body seemed reluctant to touch ground.

Sarah Slipper and Andre Lewis were statuesque lovers in the tree movements of "Lento A Tempo E Appassionato," performed with the on stage accompaniment of Principal Pianist Michel Szczesniak (who looked like a latter-day Omar Sharif). The white unitards of the dancers gave their movements a stark look that emphasized the dependence of lovers: the pair danced as a unit.

"Translucent Tones", the post-intermission selection choreographed by Nils Christe to the "Third Piano Concerto" by Bela Bartok, was a kaleidoscope of both movement and color. The costumes were amazing as they seemed to change color while the danceers performed. And the smiles on the dancers' faces conveyed both confidence in their professional skills and a desire to reach out to the audience in a warm, human way. This was one of the most appealing aspects of the company's performance.

After a second intermission (heralded by trumpets in the upper balconies) the company performed its seven-part dance collage entitled "The Hands." Choreographed by Paddy Stone, the piece had surprising bursts of comedy in its interpretations of Clapton's "Willie and the Hand Jive," Mozart's "La Ci Darem La Mano"and "Pale Hands I Loved" by Amy Woodforce Finden.

The Beatles' "I Want to Hold Your Hand" was a particularly sweet and creative work that let the dancers perform shadow puppetry on stage. The final ensemble work was danced to "He's Got The Whole World In His Hands" sung by Cleo Laine. Those lucky enough to see the Winnipeg Ballet were truly and thoroughly entertained.

Canada's Royal Winnipeg Ballet filled the FAC Monday night

Early Basie

By BRADFORD VERTER
Collegian Staff

There is no denying that William "Count" Basie is one of the great jazz pianists. Yet even greats must start out somewhere. Kansas city style is a collection of recordings made between 1929 and 1932 when Basie was playing with the Bennie Moten Orchestra.

While Basie is the brand name used to sell the album, he by no means dominates the cuts. They were recorded at a time when the music was so intricate and swiftly paced, a solo (other than vocal) rarely exceeded 20 seconds. Basie here is just part of an integrated whole.

And what parts! We have Eddie Durham, the stirring pwah pwah pwah of his angry trumpet giving such songs as "Lafayette" a soulful sound. We have the immortal Jimmy Rushing, whose rough, ejaculatory crooning appears on only ½ of the cuts on the album -- much too small a number for my taste. We have "Hot Lips" Page on trumpet and Eddie Barefield on alto sax who give a vibrant, joyous quality to pieces like "Blue Room". And of course we have Basie, who playfully helps out in "Blue Room", and whose nimble fingers make "Prince of Wales" a lordly delight.

The second side is more bluesy and dated than the first, but who cares? Eddie Durham's happy guitar and Bus Moten's prancing accordian give an element of cheer to whatever may be mourned, allowing us to smile through the (Sidney) Bechet-like clarinet on "New Vine Blues".

The treasure on the album is "Somebody Stole My Gal", featuring a too-short scat vocal by the youthful Basie, with a number of enthusiastically cheerful solos from the brass section.

This retrospective of the lost world of big band jazz is recommended for admirers of the pre-bebop period. Despite the tackily misleading packaging, the music stands for itself.

XTC erratic

By ADAM BRIGHTMAN
Collegian Correspondent
"The Big Express"—XTC
1984—Virgin Records

The Big Express was a large disappointment as I play side one. I mean, four weak songs full of herks and jerks, with no really catchy hooks in verse or chorus, and a half decent slow one about missiles just does not cut XTC's mustard. They seemed to be trying to recover territory already won during their "Black Sea" days(i.e. hard-edged, hard rocking, herk-jerk pop.)

Side two, then was a complete surprise. Lead singer/writer, Andy Partridge, searched his inner soul and found Ray Davies!? He dished out four hard-edged, imaginative, hook-laden poppers in a row. Bassist Colin Moulding, followed up with an extremely warm "I Remeber the Sun" like a not so weird Steely Dan.

The last cut, about a train that is running (get this) low on soul coal, is shrill and loopy, but does contain a fun hook.

One of the problems with this record is the production. Steve Lillywhite gave their sound depth and clarity. This new guy, David Lord, had a sound that is thinner and more mushy. The band is also missing former drummer extraordinaire Terry Chambers more than they would like to think.

This record's major problem, is a lack of consistent song writing. The weak tracks, exhibit none of the drive or melody that earmark most of their better songs.

The strong tracks resemble past triumphs in their basic intelligence, humor, and overall catchiness. They exhibit Partridge's knack for the pop tune that places rhythm and melody in synch with each other.

In summary, four extremely good songs, three middling ones, and four generally lousy ones, making for very uneven wear on the disc itself. They should have released three really good singles or a mighty fine EP. Unfortunately, we must deal with the chaff as well.

The camera lies

MICHAEL PHILLIPS
Collegian Correspondent

The large color photographs, all "untitled" 30"X40", which bedeck the walls of the Hampden Gallery were commissioned in 1983 by Diane Benson, owner of the fashionable Dianne "B" clothes boutiques. They provided a useful project for Cindy Sherman to work as well as a deadline to meet.

Sherman's realization, in 1975, that painting was dead lead her towards photography. Not the traditional concerns of the photographic image, but like Barbara Kruger, Sherrie Levine and Richard Prince. She found her concerns lay with the issues thrown up by other art forms. Her concerns lay with the moments before and after the image, and the situation running through it. Concepts of science, of experience and of how to record such things as the documentation of an event.

For instance, in her earlier work, around the end of the seventies, Sherman produced a series of black and white photographs, "Film Stills". These were staged images, stills from 1950's movies, not the vital, climactic images of a movie, but those images which give the foundations for the finale. Yet each photograph had a tension no film could possibly contain. We are the expectant voyeur, watching the stereotype confronting a media based image, which is obviously staged to deny itself.

These recent photographs lack a lot of the narrative value of the earlier film stills. They appear posed and less fluid, no longer in transit. Yet they still retain the tension. There is a distance between Sherman and the image she portrays. She is not the person just the image in a situation. One cannot deny her chameleon qualities, her features absorbed into the chosen image, something more than, or maybe different from, acting. Tiny "mistakes", hints as to the poses' nature of the image, lurk in the photographs. The back drop, where it meets the floor for instance, certain inconsistencies which contradict the image, creating a tension, an ambiguity.

It is this ambiguity which makes any interpretation of the image unnecessary. It is often done with each interpretation contradicting the last, whether these are images of the real anxieties of women, or parodies of the media image of these anxieties.

It is interesting to note that these projects were inspired by soft porn images of women. For Sherman it was not the issues of exploitation that inspired but the devices, associations, and mechanics used to achieve the image.

Cindy Sherman's rise to fame has been relatively quick. Her images sell for around $1,500, and she fulfills a hole in the market. One cannot help wondering how long that hole will last, how many variations can there be on a theme, especially when the theme is a figure and a face. Sherman has said, "Sometimes I just get sick of looking at myself."

These images, due to their ambiguity, provide a blank wall onto which issues can be thrown. It is the ricochet of these issues and arguments which make the work essential. They make you stop and think.

Hernandez MVP in AL

NEW YORK (AP) - Relief ace Willie Hernandez of the world champion Detroit Tigers was named the Most Valuable Player in the American League Tuesday, his second major postseason award.

Hernandez, who saved 32 games in 33 opportunities and posted a 9-3 record with a 1.92 earned run average, won the AL Cy Young Award last week. He became the fourth American League pitcher to win both awards. Rollie Fingers of Milwaukee did it in 1981, Oakland's Vida Blue won both in 1971, and Denny McLain of Detroit, the last Tiger MVP, swept the awards in 1968.

Three National League pitchers - Bob Gibson of St. Louis in 1968, Sandy Koufax of Los Angeles in 1963 and Don Newcombe of the Brooklyn Dodgers in 1956 - scored Cy Young and MVP sweeps.

Cross country fourth in NE

Minutemen 'aggressive'

By CHRIS TREMBLAY
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts men's cross country ran with aggression this week in the New England meet in Boston's Franklin Park.

The Minutemen grabbed fourth place in the 35 team field with Boston College coming away with the win with 37 points. Northeastern was second with 50, Yale with 124 was third and UMass was three points behind in fourth.

"The race ran pretty much the way I thought," UMass coach Ken O'Brien said. The only difference was that Providence College didn't compete as they were preparing for next week. That gave us the chance to move into fourth."

John Pannichone, who according to O'Brien was aggressive in the race, was 13th overall and the first UM finisher. Paul Stanislawzik and Jan Novack were second and third for the Minutemen, 22 and 25 overall.

"The entire team ran very well over the first three miles of the race," O'Brien said. "This helped us to hold on and stay close to Yale and take fourth place."

The UMass women's rested up for the ECAC NCAA qualifying meet at Penn State this Saturday.

George Barnwell has rushed for 777 yards (86.3 a game) and averages 23.3 yards per kickoff return. Freshman Ted Barrett has a 23.1 average.

The squad also has 14 interceptions, but they are allowing 138.22 yards a game, 5.7 yards per play. UMass has scored only 13 points in the first quarter.

UConn's Gary DuBose, who rambled for 245 yards against UMass on Saturday, was named both ECAC and Yankee Conference offensive player of the week.

Glenn Holden made 14 tackles in the UConn game, he has administered 38 hits over the last three games. Senior Split end Bob Simeone needs but one catch to tie Tim Berra on the career receptions list.

UMass teams await playoffs Saturday

Women's soccer and field hockey look to Final Four

By GERRY deSIMAS
Collegian Staff

The fourth seeded University of Massachusetts women's soccer team gets another crack at Harvard, one of the two teams to hand UMass a defeat this season, Saturday at 1 p.m. at Boyden Field in the NCAA quarter-finals.

The winner of Saturday's match-up will earn a spot in the Final Four, November 17 and 18 at the University of North Carolina.

The UMass-Harvard winner will face either top seeded Brown or UConn, a 2-1 winner over Cortland State last weekend.

UMass, 13-2-2, advanced to the quarterfinals with a 3-2 overtime win over a stubborn Boston College. Harvard disposed of Vermont by a 2-1 margin.

Harvard dealt UMass a 1-0 loss earlier this season and the Minutemen have not defeated the Crimson in two years. UMass has not ever lost an NCAA playoff game in Amherst.

In other soccer playoff action last weekend, Colorado College, ranked 14th in the country, upset third seeded George Mason 2-1. Colorado will face University of California-Berkeley, a 2-0 winner over rival UCal-Santa Barbara.

The UMass field hockey team has a tough road ahead of it if they wish to reach their second consecutive Final Four. The Minutemen, 13-4, face UConn, 15-3, Saturday at 11 a.m. in Storrs.

If UMass beats UConn, they will face fourth seeded New Hampshire on Sunday, in Storrs, for the right to go to the Final Four, November 17 and 18 in Springfield.

UConn defeated UMass in both team's season finale, 2-1 on Saturday. The Minutemen did defeat UNH (16-2-1) earlier this season.

Volleyball prevails

Solidifies playoff

By ROGER CHAPMAN
Collegian Staff

The sign of a good team is the ability to overcome obstacles and prevail in the face of adversity. The University of Massachusetts volleyball team, with co-captains Sally Maher and Patti Grant hobbled with injuries and post-season play hanging in the balance, showed just how good of a team they are by beating Springfield College 9-15, 15-6, 15-3, 12-15, 15-8 in one of the most excitingmatches of the year at Springfield.

"Win, lose, or draw we were going to leave with a smile", said coach Elaine Sortino. "We really played well. I am very pleased."

The win over the Chiefs solidifies the spikers current number four ranking in the NCAA Northeast poll. Springfield is ranked fifth in the region and is probably out of contention for a ECAC tournament bid.

A question mark going into last night's game was whether or not the spikers could play well with Maher and Grant playing hurt.

"Sally is playing hurt", said Sortino. "Patti hobbled a bit, but she played well. We got good outside hitting from Annie (Ringrose), Leslie (Smith), and Marcy (Guiliotis) and Sarah (Ryan) did an exceptional job in the middle, both hitting and blocking."

The Minutemen are in a very good spot to gain one of the four at-large bids that are up for grabs in the combined Northeast and Mid-Atlantic regions.

UMass, now 26-13 on the season, are battling with James Madison University and the Naval Academy for the last two bids to the tournament. The bids will be awarded this afternoon at 3 p.m. by the ECAC tournament selection committee.

"This win over Springfield was very important", said Sortino. "Losing would have dropped us out of the top four and that would have pretty much decided the issue about the playoffs."

The Minutemen are now preparing for another important tournament this weekend. The spikers travel to Boston and Northeastern University to compete in the Northeastern Volleyball Invitational. Because the playoff bids are being announced today, the tourney will have no bearing on the ECAC playoff picture.

MINUTEMAN NOTES: Senior Patti Grant and junior captain Maher were named to the MAIAW All-Tournament team at the MAIAW championships last weekend.

Men's soccer crushed, 5-0

By GERRY DESIMAS
Collegian Staff

When you face a team vying for playoff contention, you better come to play. The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team wasn't ready for Harvard and the Crimson took it to the Minutemen, crushing UMass 5-0 yesterday in Cambridge.

"I don't feel many players came to play," coach Jeff Gettler said. "I don't know why we were so down. We were supposed to be a good team, but we weren't today."

With the loss, UMass' second in a row, the Minutemen are still looking for their elusive tenth win. UMass is 9-7-3.

Harvard got two quick goals in the first 15 minutes and Gettler pulled most of his starters out of the game. The substitutes played well but after the Crimson took a 3-0 lead, it was all over, Gettler said.

Harvard, fighting for a possible NCAA playoff berth with UConn, Providence, and Yale, outshot UMass by a 34-4 margin. UMass goalie Matt Ginnizburg, starting in place of Don Donahue who Gettler felt had a poor game in the 2-0 loss to Maine, made eight saves while his Crimson counterpart made just one.

"The most important thing to me is not necessarily if we win or lose but if we can walk off the field with our heads high. We couldn't do that today," Gettler said.

Gettler did praise the play of freshmen Andy Bing, Aaron Feingenbaum and Paul Serafino, who wasn't even going to play due to an injury.

UMass was hurt by an injury to freshman scoring sensation Kurt Manal in the first ten minutes of the game. He may have a broken toe.

Minuteman football notebook

Statistically, the reasons are clear

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

A 2-7 record is never good, but a closer look at the UMass football schedule sheds some light on the reasons why.

The seven teams that defeated UMass are a combined 37-24 with four of them (Boston University, Holy Cross, Rhode Island and Richmond) ranked in the top 20 in Division 1-AA. Those teams are 21-8 combined.

On the other hand, the two teams UMass defeated (Ball State and Northeastern) are a combined 5-13 with Ball State ranked as the 100th best team in Division 1-A (out of 105).

UMass next two opponents should prove to be major problems. Delaware is 6-3 and in eight attempts are 8-0 against UMass and New Hampshire is 8-1 and fourth in the nation. The Wildcats will need a win to make the national playoffs.

Individually, several UMass players have distinguished themselves.

Underdog's lament

Gerry deSimas

After every season there are two types of fan. There are the fans of the championship teams, who bask in the glory and excitement of their championships. People in Detroit (Tigers), Boston (Celtics), Los Angeles (Raiders) and Edmonton (Oilers) are having just a grand old time.

But let's not dwell on something that a vast majority of us cannot participate in. Let's turn our attention to the fans of the teams who didn't win the division crown. They didn't even win half their games. And they probably don't have a prayer of winning this year, either.

They are the fans of the "losers", the has-beens, the underdogs.

They are the fans that are the most loyal. They'll sit there and root for their teams in the face of the biggest obstacles. They just don't have that Pete Peeters, Wayne Gretzky, Larry Bird or Marcus Allen.

I know of many of these frustrated fans, who feel that their team will never get there and live on past glories. Remember, today's champions become yesterday's heroes faster than you think. Just ask any Steeler, Canadian, and Brewer fan.

So to you championship fans, watch your step. You'll be back amongst the underdogs soon enough. And if you insist on rubbing our noses into the carpet, wait until we get our chance.

To the fans of the underdog has-beens, here are a few rules of decency to follow to ensure that you won't get into fights at the bar and to prevent yourself from being chewed up and spit into the street defending your hometown heroes.

I am qualified to talk on this subject. To the readership, I present my qualifications. Rooter for the Green Bay Packers (last won anything in 1972), Hartford Whalers (last won anything in 1978 in the WHA), Boston Red Sox (It's August-time to break my heart) and fans of UMass football and basketball (let's remember Dr. J. and Gary Pearson).

I also root for the Celtics (an exception to the rule).

Here are the groundrules:

Underdog fans: don't switch allegiances-nothing brands you as a zero, non-faithful fan than jumping on the champions bandwagon each year. Show pride, resolve, courage. Stand up for your losers...uh, I mean team.

Know your players-So the Buccaneers, Oilers and New Jersey Devils aren't on TV as much as the Cowboys but nothing makes you look dumber than when you don't know your team.

Territory-Realize that you're in Celtics, Bruins and Patsies...I mean Patriots territory and all your whining in the world won't make the Globe cover the Rangers, Canucks and Dallas Mavericks as much as you would like.

Patience and Hope-The Red Sox won in 1975. So what if their last World Series win was in 1918? Hell, anything can happen. Look, the Cubs won this year.

When they win-If it has been more than 10 years-go crazy, have a ball, enjoy. Who knows when it will come your way again.

One exception: Islanders fans have won enough in the last four years to last them 40 years. Right, Ranger fans?

Rep. Olver lectures student senators

By NANCY A. BUKAR

By LAURA KOESTER
and LAURA YEE
Collegian Staff

State Senator John Olver addressed the Student Government Association (SGA) at the University of Massachusetts Wednesday night on the presidential election results and the consequences for the Democratic party.

Olver, a former chemistry professor at UMass and a representative in the state senate since 1969, asked the audience to excuse his "rambling" because "I am a very tired politician," from campaigning for other condidates. Olver ran unopposed.

"At first glance, there's a need for some work to be done in the Democratic party," Olver said.

"There were very limited gains for women (in Congress) even though an enormous amount of energy was put into the campaigns by women's issues and other groups," Olver said. The election of minorities, environmental activists, and female activists was "not enough, simply not enough," he said. "The activism was ingrown and it never reached out as far as it intended to." However, Olver did commend theelection of the first woman governor in Vermont, Madeleine May Kunin.

Olver then discussed why many people voted for Ronald Reagan.

"There was a large percentage of the population that could say that they were better off in 1984 than they were in 1980," he said. "I think what happened more is the question of their styles. Reagan has a sunny personality and he's witty," Olver said, while, in comparison, Mondale came off as "strident" to large crowds.

Olver said that Mondale gambled with his deficit proposals, which included the raising of taxes.

"President Reagan will raise taxes in the next four years- there can be little doubt about it. But, it will be called something else besides taxes. The tax issue was extremely detrimental to the Democratic cause," Olver said.

As for the Democrat's role in the future, Olver said, "I think that the Democratic coalition- it's still too early to be rethinking it and there will be a lot of opposition; they (Democrats) stick by their guns. There will be a lot of attitudes of they'd rather fight then switch."

The Undergraduate Student Senate last night approved funding to continue the shopper shuttle bus, listened to an administration official talk about the proposed General Education plan, and instructed the Rents & Fees committee to study the possibility of changing the meal plan to make it more flexible for students.

The shopper shuttle, which began running last spring, was given $624 from the finance account.

The bus, "provides an alternative to shopping in downtown Amherst and to eating in the D.C.'s for people who live on campus. It also provides a service for people who don't have cars," said Gregg Klauson, a member of the UMass Transit Advisory Board.

Commuter senator Fran Hegeler said, "The shuttle provides a valuable service to students."

The shuttle will continue to have experimental status until next spring, when the Pioneer Valley Transit Authority will either approve or reject the route.

The senate also heard associate provost for undergraduate education, Fern L. Johnson, who has worked on the General Education proposal for the past four years, give an overview of the plan's history, format and purpose.

Johnson said the first proposal introduced to the faculty senate two years ago was rejected and the General Education Council was formed to further review the bill. The second proposal, which is now in the faculty senate, is undergoing revisions and amendments.

"We'll soon have a proposal we'll all feel good about," she said. "General Education is an idea whose time has come."

Johnson said the General Education proposal differs in that it is "a university requirement" for all undergraduate students beginning Fall 1986 and "not a college requirement."

"The proposal (if passed) includes 33 distributed credits including the writing requirement," she said. The proposal would "minimally add three credits to the present system and maximally add six."

She said general education would provide students with a more developed knowledge in the areas of the social world, biological and physical world and in analytical reasoning.

Some senators expressed concern with the proposal's required two level math requirement called analytical reasoning but Johnson said the the tier I level could be satisfied through a competency test or a remedial level class. The tier II level could be fulfilled through quantitative or analytical reasoning.

Port Authority head lectures

Says public and private sectors must cooperate

Peter Goldmark

Speaking to about 60 University of Massachusetts students and faculty yesterday, the executive director of the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey explained how the public and private business sectors must work together to aid America's economy.

Peter Goldmark was the second speaker this semester in the "Chancellor's Seminars on the New American Economy" series at the University.

In 1977, Goldmark was the youngest senior municipal executive in metropolitan New York when, at the age of 37, he assumed his position of Port Authority director.

When he accepted the job, New York City almost defaulted and Goldmark said that he decided one goal of the Port Authority could be to prevent municipal defaults in the area by conceiving and executing long-term plans that would do more than keeping area transportation and shipping running smoothly.

One of the first projects the Authority initiated was developing industrial parks in the area, a task previously left to the private sector, Goldmark said. The goal on a larger scale, he said, "was to affect the energy cost (of the parks), to expand the energy base, to find alternative (energy) sources, and to target (private) companies willing to grow and expand in the region."

Another project the Authority began was the promotion of New York City as a travel stopover. Through the "I love New York" ad campaign, and promoting the city as an excellent value for air travel stopovers to over-seas travel agents, the Authority and the travel agents were able to convince travelers to include New York City in their travel plans.

"It's working and one of the three sectors that pulled New York and New Jersey out of their fiscal crisis was the airport service sector," Goldmark said.

Goldmark cited the space program as another example of private business and the government working together. "As a result, we have the number one airplane business in the world," he said, "and 80 percent of the world's aireraft are American made."

Goldmark also said that he thinks the economy, the recent recovery, and our productivity is "weaker than it looks." But people believe economic rhetoric about the economy's health and our ability to control it, Goldmark said.

"We are the only country in the world that has this debate about who should do it," Goldmark said, referring to either the public or private secotr's roles in economic development, "other countries use both."

"Together, we play a role in cost competitive projects for the country and the world," he said.

Election reaction

(AP) The re-elected Ronald Reagan was burned in effigy Wednesday in Manila, was the toast of the town at Harry's bar in Paris, and was urged by one world leaderr after another to dedicate his second term to ending the arms race.

If Reagan dreams of a place in history, commented the prestigious French daily Le Monde, "he ought to dream of being a man of reconciliation rather than the impetus for the Cold War."

Outside the embassy in Manila, 100 demonstrators burned effigies of Reagan and Philippine President Ferdinand E. Marcos andcalled for an end to U.S. aid to the authoritarian Marcos government.

The Reagan re-election also met with disapproval amon anti-nuclear activists in Western Europe.

Outside the U..S. Embassy in London, as 1,500 guesets arrived for the all-night election party, 100 protestors staged a torchlight vigil for nuclear disarmament.

The American election results mean "in all probability...four more years of reckless armament and overt threats of war," said Anne Borgmann, a spokeswoman for the anti-NATO Green's parlimentary faction in West Germany. David Steel, leader of Britian's centrist Liberal Party, described the election outcome as "sad."

Regent chair to address faculty senate

By LAURA YEE
Collegian Staff

The chairman of the Massachusetts State Board of Regents of Public Higher Education will address the Professional Association of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst (PAUMA) and the faculty senate today.

David J. Beaubien will present his views on the "unique qualities of higher edueation in Massachusetts, its positive aspects and future trends in education," to PAUMA at noon, according to the regents office.

At today's faculty senate meeting, Beaubien will address the senate before they vote on whether to form a committee that will monitor the regents policies, actions, and initiatives.

"We have a delegate to the board of trustees but not to the regents," Chester Davis, professor of Afro-American studies and Rules Committe member said.

Davis said the committee will help give the senate reports on the regents because the senate "often don't hear about their actions until weeks later."

Because creation of the committee requires a senate by law change, an action that must be considered at three meetings before the senate, the committe will be established on a temporary basis.

Beaubien, 49, was recently appointed chairman to the Regents by Gov. Michael Dukakis. He was a graduate of engineering at UMass and has served on the board of regents for several years. He is also a former member of the UMass board of Trustees.

Beaubien is currently, senior vice president of E.G. & G Incorporated, a high tech firm in Wellesley.

UMass police take on illegal parking

By MINDY ANTONIO
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts police are conducting parking sticker checks more frequently to eliminate illegal parking on campus.

The Department of Public Safety is also conducting a study to determine which lots are used illegally most often. The problem of getting a parking space in the central area of campus is caused in part by drivers who park illegally, James Lewe, parking coordinator, said.

"We want to find out if some of the lots have vacant spaces and, at the same time, which ones are crowded. We also want to find out how many cars are illegally parked, how many shouldn't be there. " Lee said.

"Students duck into a lot for a class, then out again. They don't park long enough for campus police to catch them," Lee said.

He said lot 65 near Engineering East, lot 63 near Worcester Dining Commons, and lot 50, the small lots around Southwest are areas where problems have been greatest.

Lee said, "We are hoping to set up attendant control booths at the lots very soon."

Lee said the office is discussing proposals of how to staff and finance the booths and may hire work study students.

"There's also another concern about information in terms of the parking booths and how there can be greater utilization for people coming to campus who don't know where to park as well as where to go to get information. There is concern for how those booths might be staffed, even longer hours perhaps," Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis Madson said

Madson and John DeNyse, vice-chancellor of administration and finance, will be meeting with the Parking and Transportation Committee to present their ideas in the next few weeks, according to Madson.

The peripheral lots (P lots) near William J. McGuirk Stadium are now absorbing some demand for parking spaces on campus, said Lee.

"There aren't enough spaces in the central area for everyone, and people are adjusting to the outside lots," he said. "There is no real shortage."

Lee said the situation is not a new problem and complaints have not been high this semester. "We encourage people to report any problems they have to us immediately so we can deal with it," hed said.

Women to relate stories of injustice

"Personal Histories of Resistance," a women's resistance gathering will meet tomorrow night at 7:30 p.m., at the First Congregational Church in Amherst.

The gathering will provide a forum for women to share their stories of injustice.

The gathering is sponsored by Traprock Peace Center of Deerfield and "Not in Our Name," the Women's Resistance Action from Northampton. Speaking at the gathering will be Jean Grosshotlz, a Mt. Holyoke College faculty member; Juanita Nelson, a long-time tax resister, and farmer; Judy Scheckel, a staff member of Traprock Peace Center; and Felice Yeskel, a feminist activist and UMass doctoral student.

Cash, wristwatch stolen from different offices

A woman returning to her unlocked office in Arnold House at 12:40 p.m. Tuesday observed a man leaving the office after he stole an undetermined amount of cash from her pocketbook in the office, UMass police said.

A wristwatch and a dictating machine, togeter valued at $300, were reported stolen Tuesday, from an unlocked seventh floor office in Herter Hall, police said.

RSO members arrested while protesting

Thirteen members from the University of Massachusetts Radical Student Union (RSU) were arrested in Washington, D.C. for civil disobedience at the White House Saturday.

"The demonstration in which we participated in was only one of three occurring that day," said RSU memberr Beatrix Hoffman. "One group of protesters took the White House tour and when they walked out of the building they stepped over the fence and prayed on the White House lawn," she said.

Another group blocked traffic on Pennsylvania Avenue for about one hour, according to RSU member Matthew Shakespeare.

After these demonstrations, the RSU, the UMass Peacemakers, and the Western Massachusetts Latin American Solidarity Committee entered the 60-foot lawn in front of the White House fence and stood in one place with signs and banners, according to Hoffman.

Demonstrators were either carried or dragged off the lawn, Hoffamn said. Protestors are required to keep moving so no photographs can be taken and bombs can't be hidden from view, RSU member Patty Aman said.

Faculty mulls amendments

General Education nears vote

By LAURA YEE
Collegian Staff

Five amendments by University of Massachusetts professors to the General Education proposal will be voted on at today's faculty senate meeting before a final vote may be taken later this month.

The General Education proposal would require all undergraduate students to take specific classes in certain departments to fulfill University core requirements. For instance, in order to fulfill the C core requirement, a student won't be able to take just history classes; or take just political science classes to satisfy the D core.

If passed, the C, D, and E cores would be replaced by areas called, "the social world", "biological and physical world", and "analytical reasoning" for all incoming students during the fall of 1986 and thereafter. The University writing requirement would still need to be fulfilled and is not included in the General Education proposal.

During the past three senate meetings faculty and administration have debated the language, philosophy, purpose and goals of the General Education bill that would change the present core requirements.

Chester Davis, professor of Afro-American studies and member of the faculty senate rules committee said the senate will eventually "pass the proposal."

"The debate has not been as heated as we anticipated," he said. "But it might be, once modifications go through." Davis said that the senate will make a final vote on Nov. 29.

The proposed amendments include:

•Since no more than 25 percent of the courses in a given department can be classified as General Education requirements, when that limitation becomes a problem the General Education Council may grant approval to departments to offer a greater percentage of their regularly taught courses to fulfill requirements.

•Courses in the "social world" will have two divisions call humanities and fine arts, and social and behavioral sciences. The amendment requires three courses be taken from each division. Students must also take one course from the "historical studies" and "cultural diversity" components.

•"Social world" and "biological world" requirements must be taken in different departments, or they "must be explicitly interdisciplinary."

•At least one of the three courses taken to satisfy the "biological and physical world" requirement must include a lab class.

•The sections in the social world requirement now referred to as "the arts" and "literature and the arts" will be renamed "humanities and Fine Arts."

Students choose Mondale, Kerry

By RICHARD MARTIN
Collegian Staff

On campus voters from the University of Massachusetts backed Walter Mondale by a 5-2 margin over President Ronald Reagan, and supported Senate candidate John Kerry by a 3-1 margin over Ray Shamie.

Amherst voting precincts 3 and 4 are comprised almost entirely of UMass students. Precint 3 includes all dormitories not in the Southwest Residential Area, University Apartments, and Kappa Sigma. Precinct 4 includes 15 fraternities and sororities, and the Southwest Residential Area.

Precinct 3 voted for Mondale over Reagan, 1497-636, while Precinct 4 was 1460-587 in favor of Mondale. Kerry won in the 3rd Precinct, 1618-465, while his margin in the 4th Precinct was 1592-402.

In backing the Democratic ticket, UMass students followed the same voting pattern that had been established in every presidential election since 1966, the year the Southwest was completed.

Since then, the Republicans have done well at UMass in only one election, in 1968. In the two predominantly-student precincts, Democratic running mates Hubert Humphrey and Edmund Muskie defeated Richard Nixon and Spiro Agnew by 790-529.

Republicans did well in 1968 while many college students were disenchanted with the Democratic party because of Humphrey's nomination over Minnesota senator Eugene McCarthy, at the Democratic convention in Chicago.

"Clean Gene"McCarthy was at the forefront of the "Dump Johnson" (President Lyndon) movement at the height of the Vietnam War. McCarthy received 778 out of 999 votes from the two precincts in the April, 1968 presidential primary. Humphrey received 79 votes.

In 1980, the two precincts combined 1419-491 in favor of Carter and Mondale over Reagan and Bush. The election recorded the lowest turnout of registered UMass students.

In the 1976 elections, Carter and Mondale received 2035 votes from the two precincts while Republican candida'es Gerald Ford and Robert Dole received 907 votes. Incumbent Senator Ted Kennedy defeated Michael Robertson and received 2337 votes compared with Robertson's 572 from the two precincts that year.

In 1972, George McGovern and Sargent Shriver were favored over Richard Nixon and Spiro Agnew 2028-662, by voters in the third and fourth precincts.

ROOM CHOOSING PROCESS FOR SPRING 1985

Please read carefully

RESERVING YOUR CURRENT ROOM ASSIGNMENT

If you intend to keep your present residence hall assignment, personally sign up with your Resident Director/Residence Hall Manager on Tuesday, November 13. Deadline for room reservation is Tuesday November 13.

If you want to keep your present Residence Hall assignment while also submitting a preference form you must do the following:

1. Sign up for a room in your current residence hall on either Tuesday, November 13 or Wednesday November 14.
2. Fill out a Preference Form. On the Preference Form in the lower right corner is a box you must "check" if you wish to be returned to your residence hall if your residence hall or area choices cannot be met.

Your old residence hall assignment is guaranteed only if you do both steps.

CHANGING YOUR ROOM ASSIGNMENT

If you wish to move to another room in the same residence hall, you must sign up with your Resident Director/Residence Hall Manager. Deadline for moving within a residence hall is Wednesday, November 14.

If you wish to move to another residence hall, you must complete a Housing Preference Form. Deadline for returning completed Housing Preference Forms to the Housing Assignment Office is Wednesday, November 21. Preference Forms may be dropped off at any Area Operations Office (Southwest-JFK Lobby, Northeast/Sylvan-Johnson, Central/Orchard Hill-101Baker).

ROOMMATE REQUESTS

If you wish to move to another residence hall to room with a student already assigned to that residence hall, you must together complete a Roommate Request Form. Deadline for returning Roommate Request Forms to the Housing Assignment Office is Thursday, November 15.

If you wish to become roommates with a student in a residence hall to which neither of you is currently assigned, you must each complete a Housing Preference Form. These forms should be identical (with the exception of the "check" box) and stapled together. Deadline for returning Housing Preference Forms is Wednesday, November 21.

IN-HOUSE ROOM REQUEST FORMS

If, during the regular In-House Room Choosing period, you were unable to secure a particular type of accommodation (a particular single or double room), please contact your Resident Director/Residence Hall Manager and fill out an In-House Room Request Form. Rooms that become available during Intersession will be assigned according to seniority, to those students who have filled out this form and returned it to their Resident Director/Residence Hall Manager.

QUESTIONS?

If you still have questions about the Room-Choosing process, please contact your House Staff or the Housing Assignment Office (545-2100), 235 Whitmore. Thank you.

Time to wake up, America

Lori Kirkland

Sure, I could see catching a few z's at a meaningless cabinet meeting, but it seems the majority of Americans have slept through an entire campaign. What threw this allegedly patriotic country into such an ignorant, apathetic stupor? Maybe Ron's not the only one with a memory lapse.

I seem to recall somewhere back in 11th grade a big, red, white and blue textbook shouting,"...a country built on the principle of democracy...equal rights, opportunity, and treatment!" I'm afraid that democracy has joined the ranks of Santa and the Tooth Fairy. We'd all like to believe but it's just time to grow up, right?

Mr. Reagan appears to dream of his own absolutism. He wishes to dictate that students pray in school; that women bear unwanted children whether conceived in the midst of terrifying force or not. Sure, these issues are old and worn-out but citizens should not act as children bored with a toy too often played with. This is real. This is the future. Whether or not an individual believes in God or abortion or not, still is it not scary that a government can attempt control over personal decisions of any kind? Not only is it frightening on a small scale, it, too, can be interpreted as a step towards absolutism. Well, we voted for it.

Personally, when we're talking about the equal rights that means that I have the undisputed power to do with my life what I want. Everybody should have this right unconditionally. Who do these Republicans and company think they are in wanting to command our kindergarteners to conform to daily religious rites? Obviously, the rules of conduct are to be ordered, but school is a place to be taught theories, not told which theories to observe or dismiss. These are children—they're impressionable. Wiser we would be to allow them to become educated and determine their own individuality before attempting to sell our mere theories, religious, political or otherwise, as truths. Unique, distinguishable things are not shaped by cookie cutters. We should not allow our children to be molded by an educational system along these lines. Let them think on their own and who knows? Maybe we'll crank out some real leaders with original ideas for a change. No—we voted against it.

Forget nuclear war for a minute because it looks like the hugest threat to American life is our own negligence and nonchalance in educating ourselves of issues and decisions of state. Turning our biggest threat into our best weapon would have been as easy as reading a newspaper. Or even televised news. Or at least, the debates.

Well, we blew it, America. Even though he sucked in Oscar, Ronald McReagan has snowed us again and the word "trouble" is about to take on greater proportions as is governmental control.

Okay, so we don't have a democracy. It never really was; just like Santa. But we did believe once and it started to work. The least we could have done was to preserve what freedom we have and give back what foreign freedoms we've stolen.. We had a chance to elect such liberties as well as the all-imperative arms freeze. This candidate invited a chance but instead we opted for inevitable doom. Were votes cast blindly or what? There were blatant conflicts in Reagan's platform, especially with the less pressing and clearly uncomfortable issues, which he promptly and frequently pushed aside. Yet, problems with seemingly simple issues are tell-tale of difficulties with larger ones. Accumulation of your single votes has determined the fate of the nation as well as that of other nations.

It's time to stop shaking our heads in denial. The U.S. has a lot of problems, especially in foreign policy. The nuclear war threat is not imaginary. (Reagan and his cronies say that such a war is winnable but I'm not too psyched about experimenting.) The election are over but the issues haven't vanished. If U.S. citizens became more knowledgable about what lies beyond their own backyards and stood up against the atrocities found there, the next four years could be a little less grim. It is worth a try I don't know about the rest of you, but I'm one who doesn't hope to die before I get old. And now—I'm scared.

A night in jail

It's Sunday. Yesterday I woke up in a Washington DC church after a few hours sleep on the floor. Light streamed through the blue stained glass over the still sleeping figures all around me. As others awoke and began preparations for the day to come their bright eyes and warm smiles reassured me that ours was a just cause.

I write this from Washington's Central Cell Block. It smells like urine and Roach-Pruf and the walls don't look like they've been cleaned since at least 1980. The bed is made of cast iron and there is no mattress. They feed us through the bars at 6 a.m. and 6 p.m. with bologna sandwiches and donuts. By acting upon my conscience I became one of the 133 persons arrested at the White House for civil disobedience.

I am number 374080. The police have taken my picture three times that I know of, finger printed me twice, and handcuffed me four times. Such is the price of violating the laws of a "free" society.

It was the last day of the "Harvest of Shame." Seventeen of us came from UMass to Washington to state that there are 12,000,000 hungry people in the richest nation on earth. We are ashamed that the nation's capitol can't shelter its own homeless. We are ashamed of our role in the genocidal war in Central America. We are ashamed of the American people who let this continue.

Jail is a dehumanizing experience, and it's easy to begin wondering whether holding a sign in front of the White House really might have been a crime. The sign read "Preparation for Nuclear War is Preparation for Suicide." It exceeded the three foot allowable limit, thereby blocking the picture-perfect postcard view of 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue. The maximum penalty for this is six months in jail.

While I sit here as 374080 the real criminals engineer new arms contracts, finance a war against civilians and pay for it all by taking food out of the mouths of the hungry. They derive their legitimacy from the American people. If you feel ashamed, it's time you said so.

Keep an open mind...

John Jablonski

I wear a button on my shirt, two interlocking male symbols, that identifies me as a gay man. I give up my "privilege" to fit silently into the heterosexual majority. I am openly gay in a society where some look upon gays with disfavor or worse. Why?

Let me make a distinction. The question "Why am I openly gay?" is different from the question "Why am I gay?" The latter is a question whose answer does not concern me. I don't care why I'm gay; I simply know that I am. Questions about the cause of homosexuality too often imply that someone or something is to blame. Accusations of blame needlessly hurt many people, especially parents of gays. I'll save my ideas on this last point for another time.

So, why does this man, who happens to be gay, feel it is important that everyone know this fact? Two reasons come to mind. One is a bit selfish, and the other is not. First the selfish one.

I feel better, more empowered in my daily life, knowing that I am not hiding my sexual orientation. There was a time when I was very afraid that people might discover my homosexuality. I was worried they might sense it in the way I spoke, or in the way I stood. I, like most people exposed to our society, had a negative view of gay people. Being gay, I let this negative view affect the way I viewed myself. I felt I had this hidden flaw and was careful to try and keep it hidden. I was overly self-conscious and anxious about other people's perception of me.

Now that I have learned to accept being gay as just another part of my personality, it feels very good to share that part of me with others in the world, just as heterosexual people do. The button I wear is my way of expressing pride in myself, pride in the part of myself that I was afraid of for so long.

Now reason number two. This is the "unselfish" one.

Gay people as a whole have suffered from their invisibility. Young gays grow up without the benefit of a role model. Straight people and young gays do not see the large number of gay people who contribute to society. Being openly gay, I demonstrate that the negative view of people have of gays is wrong. I dislodge stereotypes, and the discrimination that comes with them, by counter-example. I show other gays that they do not have to discriminate against themselves by accepting the dreary forecast of lonliness and failure the society would have them believe. I show them a positive, self-assured, confident-of-his-success, gay man.

If I can help gay people feel good about themselves, if I can help straight people rid themselves of oppressive stereotypes, them I feel good about myself.

The next time you meet an openly gay person, open your mind; learn. You've got nothing to lose, and society has a lot to gain.

The false hope of abortion

Rusty Denton

A recent Gallup poll indicated that 43 percent of Americans favored having our laws based on the Ten Commandments. It's not 57 percent, but what the heck, that's still a pretty significant minority. Among those polled, the professionals who least favored decisions based on the Ten Commandments were judges, teachers, and media personnel. I find it interesting that those people also happen to be the positions most responsible for influencing public opinion. Whether that is because liberal-minded people seek out those positions, or because the positions change their thinking is not really mine to say; I just find it interesting.

What I can comment on is a prevailing attitude that says if my highest priority isn't on people and what they think they need, then I am not compassionate. The Ten Commandments were fine for primitive Israel, but they have no bearing today. Very interesting. In other words, the strict Judaeo-Christian ethic is not compassionate.

There are some who would take issue with that, and I am one of them. People are way up on my list of values, but what they may think they need is not always so high. Let's take an example: abortion.

The argument which is forwarded again and again is that a woman who has been raped or been forced into an incestuous relationship should be entitled to an abortion. Well, that's pretty fair-minded so far. Now tell me, what percentage of abortions performed today will have to do with rape or incest? A miniscule percentage. I suppose that I'm not really being fair if I don't mention unwed teenage mothers who do not want or cannot properly care for children. I won't comment on the circumstances that brought them to that. What about older women who could sustain bodily damage from giving birth? That seems fair. What amount women whose husbands or lovers have left them? Gee, that's a pretty good thing to think about. Even if we should somehow only consider abortions performed for reason other than these, there is a whopping number that will be done today.

However, saying "no", to something like this is not usually seen as compassionate, so let me tell you about the compassionate side of saying "no".

I say "no" to fathers who leave their children and/or the mother stranded. I think it should be criminalized. I say "no" to social circumstances that leave an immature teenage woman stuck with a life or death decision for this fetus which she is beginning to love. I say "no" to court decisions which trivialize the trauma of rape.

What else do I say "no" to ? To the emotional upheaval that follows a woman for years after an abortion; "No" to the pro-choice education that never mentions how abortion often permanently damages a woman's ability to have children. You don't hear much about these things, do you? "No" to life-or-death decisions for babies which don't involve life-or-death situations for a mother. Ask me who is trivializing the seriousness of an abortion. I'll tell you. And I'll tell you about real alternatives.

There are thousands of couples who desperately want to adopt. There are thousands of women who are not much better off after an abortion than they were before they got pregnant. How sad to be concerned about a few months of their life, worried about their future misery, and never consider that they need much more help than an abortion. They also need home skills, job skills, and self-respect.

It seems to me that abortion's false hopes for painless solutions are far less compassionate than Ten honest Commandments.

Letters to the Editor

Overstepping the bounds?

Where is the apology from the Collegian's "sexist" sports editor, Peter Abraham, requested by D.R. Bousquet on Oct. 29? Abraham has clearly overstepped his bounds by commenting so derogatorily,("disgusted when the best teams at school are the women's soccer and field hockey teams")on women's athletics at UMass. At first an apology might have been sufficient.

His blatant disregard of an apology demonstrates very well that Abraham meant what he wrote. Therefore, is there any reason for his trash to be in print? It must be an oversight of the Collegian's staff that he has maintained his position. Certainly the staff cannot support his belief that women's athletics are not worthy of notice and respect.

The sports section rarely offers any support for the athletic teams. It often headlines the losses; whereas, the victories are sidelined and spread across three pages (e.g. the sports pages Monday). Can the Collegian not find a more open-minded sports editor as well as a more capable layout procedure from a population of approximately 25,000? I'm certain they can. I only hope these suggestions aid them in realizing the need sooner than they probably would have.

Do students value lives?

When the Southwest Residential College was built, I worked in the Housing Office. Also built was the tunnel under Massachusetts Avenue connecting the southwest area to the main campus. This tunnel was built to be used by the students living in the Southwest area and was built with their safety in mind. However, I don't believe the students know or realize that that tunnel is there. Anyway, it doesn't seem that they know because when I drive on Massachusetts Avenue in the morning or evening, many students cross Mass. Avenue to and from SWC not using the crosswalk and not using the tunnel. I am wondering if the students are aware that there is such a tunnel. Also, I am wondering if they value their life at all trying to cross Mass. Ave? I fear someday a student will be hit or even killed trying to cross from Southwest Area to the Main Campus.

Shouldn't someone educate them in crossing a highway? Or shouldn't someone inform them about the safety in using the tunnel? Who is responsible for their safety, the University, the student, or the driver of the car using Mass. Avenue?

It's the 'chameleon' in us

Rob Skelton

This statement may seem twisted, but I like Boy George. It's true—I respect this crazed androgyny. It may seem unfashionable, and I have been known to play devil's advocate, but for what he has done Boy George has earned tremendous reverence from this writer.

The funky pop beat of the Culture Club, with its compelling hooks, has been impressed on us all through the Top Forty. But more than their likeable simplicity, for me, is the overall phenomena of the scene and the effect it has had worldwide.

Here we have George O'Dowd, a bloke from working class origins who, through his personal initiative (and weirdness), found himself a niche in the London music scene, and then in the hungry-for-gimmickry world of pop.

He has done, despite persistent ridicule and other obstacles, what most of us dream of but never wake up to—he has become wealthy by achieving fantastic success in his chosen field.

I felt a twinge of the same respect recently as the campus Republicans rallied at the Student Union. In what is supposedly a tolerant academic atmosphere, the right to free expression was severed as hostile forces disconnected a PA system.

Steve Erickson, the president of the UMass Republican Club (and a speaker at the rally) is a neighbor of mine. Often he is seen wearing Reagan or Shamie buttons, and for this he is the subject of some whispering, but not from me. I have only respect someone who has the courage to stress his view in what is becoming an increasingly hostile political environment.

Oppression is a word that gets a lot of use around here, especially when dealing with topics such as bigotry, South Africa, and the umpteen "-isms". Speak of the repression of Republicans and the meaning gets changed to "righteous revulsion".

UMass Chancellor Joseph Duffey has made the official line clear: to harass and threaten the rights of others to free expression is not appropriate in a democratic society.

An indignant Ferraro supporter, claiming she had been mentally raped at the recent rally by a Reagan-man, astonished and astounded the University community by admitting that she provoked his verbal atrocity by spitting at him as a response to his freedom of expression. Granted they both entered the scum-zone. Why did their two-sided dispute get such play?

Is it possible to be political without becoming poisonous about it? Is open-mindedness, or objectivity, a thing of the past? Can we weigh the goods and bads of each issue without becoming insane?

It is a fact that substantial portions of the population, and notably the young urban professionals, are economically conservative but socially liberal. This holds that no one in their right mind has a serious gripe with the free-market economy. And who in their right mind wants to see more government interference?

By the same standards, what sane person cannot see conflict in the non-separation of church and state as perceived by our incumbent President?

And of course Boy George has a point when he sings that "war is stupid". We all have some "chameleon" in us, as he has helped us see.

There's more to it all than rising tempers can tamper with, and that's why I plead, please, be reasonable.

Exchange of ideas valuable

As much as things change, they stay the same. After two months of reading these pages, talking to other students and being a 36-year-old freshman, I feel a need to make some self-indulgent observations.

Over the last 60 days, I have read a healthy exchange of opinions covering gay and lesbian rights, politics, abortion, rape, women's rights, Third World rights, non-smokers rights, the pros and cons of cheap phones and expensive art objects, to name just a few. They key words in this paragraph are "healthy exchange". Even though each individual person devoutly believes his/her own position is the healthy one, the fact that every side of an issue can be heard is very healthy.

My first time through college was in the mid 60s when politics, student rights and the war gave us many intense, heart-felt issues that spurred protest, debate and editorials. I was at Kent State University during the riots and witnessed students and innocent by-standers pay the ultimate price for protest and dissent. The decade of the 60s and early 70s gave us many dramas and issues for debate, it also entrusted us with an important legacy. People on every side of every debate during those years paid dearly, whether in a jungle in Vietnam, a grassy hill at Kent State, or the pages of editorial sections, so the rest of us, years later, can continue the debates, no matter what the subject. The Vietnam debate becomes the El Salvador debate, the students' rights debate gave way to gay, lesbian and Third World debates, and the desperate fight for Grateful Dead tickets becomes the same desperate fight for Bruce Springsteen tickets. Some things come full circles, i.e. short hair and short skirts.

Some things stay the same. It's been 18 years since I was in college and I find the debate goes on. This may be one of our most important accomplishments, for without the right to debate, dissent, question, object, picket and rally, we have very little.

So, to those three gentlemen sitting in the Hatch who were discussing in graphic detail what they would do with a "faggot" if they caught one; to the young woman who said all men were potential rapists and all women potential victims; to those with their one-sided look at abortions; to all of you who feel that only your side of the issue should be heard, I would suggest the following: Listen to other views. Dislike them if you want, hate them if you must, but at least let them be expressed. Only one of two things will happen. First you will still feel your view is correct or secondly you may be provoked into deep thought and questioning. In either case, you will be the better for the exchange of ideas. As human beings, it helps to have our beliefs and ideas gently disturbed from time to time.

So the next time you are moved to write a letter or answer one, remember 20,000 other people out here have the same right to express their beliefs, no matter what those beliefs. We can only come out losers when we stifle that rights. Thank you for your indulgence. One last thought for those of you who may dismiss this letter as coming from an "old man". I say, it seems it was only yesterday that I was 18.

You know this stereotype.
And you know it doesn't apply to you. Yet finding an employer who ignores stereotypes and recognizes talent may seem difficult, if not impossible.

At The Travelers, we know exceptional talent when we see it. And we have a program that prepares gifted, highly motivated individuals for management careers in data processing.

Our ACCENT (Accelerated Entry Into Management) program will challenge your technical and intellectual abilities. Through rotations, you'll contribute to areas like Network Design and Development, Personal Computer Development, and Operating System Support. And across-the-board experience is good preparation for management responsibilities.

And with your ACCENT training behind you, you'll be ready for a visible management position. In a department with an annual budget exceeding $200 million dollars, state-of-the-art data centers in Hartford and Atlanta, and one of the largest distributed networks in the world.

The Travelers is a diversified financial services corporation with $33 billion dollars in assets. We are committed to improving productivity with the help of such leading-edge technologies as the 12,000 IBM personal computers we've purchased.

THE TERMINATOR
Directed by Jim Cameron
Starring Arnold Schwarzenegger and Michael Biehn
At the Mt. Farm Cinemas

By JIM TAYLOR
Collegian Staff

Arnold Schwarzenegger found his perfect role in The Terminator as a cyborg unit one-zero from 2029, which is unleased in 1984. He, or it, is sent by a superior race of computers, whose main interest is the extermination of the inferior humans. He plays the part with machine-like quality and 7-8 lines of dialogue, nothing new.

The story is typical, recycled stuff, but it seems to work. The film is tolerable until the last fifteen minutes, which is one of the slowest ever anti-climatical endings next to a horror movie. There's even an epilogue tagged on to tie in the mess and explain the future, if you were too slow to figure it out. If you don't understand the mystery of the child by the quarter mark, you're a little more than slow.

The writers made an attempt at characterization, which didn't work. There are many action sequences but no new stunts.

Michael Biehn is a revolutionary who is trying to prevent the Terminator's programmed plans. Linda Hamilton is the poor heroine. The film is so low-key that the performances become interesting. Paul Winfield is wasted as the typical cop.

Director Jim Cameron's previous works include such classics as Piranha II, special effects assistant on Escape from New York. At least he's getting better.

Alan Greenburg's photography plays off the diffusion of light. It gives downtown L.A. a futuristic look for the present, which I actually like. Just about every bit of L.A. has been used to the max, so they tried something new. Everything, even various characters like New Wavers is a disco and some punks, has a machine-like quality to it. Huum, is this a message?

A lot of this film resembles an ad for Fantasy II, a new spec effects group. Award-winner Stan Winston created the "Special Terminator Effects", which are quite good if you're into that sort of thing.

Schwarz... carries an arsenal that would make Charles Bronson jealous, with everything from a laser-sighted .45 to a 9mm Uzi. He kills all but about four people he meets.

Some scenes come across very funny, like a fight with a roomie's boyfriend, and a program-selected comment to an insultive janior. After the machine's eye is scorched, big Arnie cuts it out with an X-acto and slips on some shades.

All in all, this simple-minded farce is a tolerable film. You just have to go in a mood for it. It's formula stuff, and destined to make a buck.

[Editor's Note: This movie was the number one box office seller of the past week all over the nation].

The Eagles "were more aggressive and more physical tahn last time" Spence said.

Spence has played behind senior Co-Captain Christine Taggart for the entire season. She has thus far been used exclusively as coach Kalenkeni Banda'a "instant offense" coming from a young and powerrful UMass bench.

She has easily lived up to the description. With six goals and seven assists, totaling nineteen points, she is the team's second leading scorerr. Only freshman Julie Depauw totals more goals and total points.

"I don't like for her to start," said Banda, "but she got the goal." Which, for the coach of the fourth ranked Minutemen, is what matters.

Cathy herself said she is more comfortable in her supporting role as an infudion of devaxtating offense.

"It's easier coming off the bench, I can just go all out." S tarting against B.C.Spence found tath she had to pace herself. "When you start therre is pressure" Spence added.

"We missed Chris Taggart maturity" Banda said, but added that "Cathy is improving with every game."

Spence said she felt that starting in such a crucial game showed "that coach Banda has faith in me.

With Taggart back in the line-up for this Saturday's contest with Harvard, Cathy Spence will most likely return to her role as the offensive machine she has paayed all season. "She can kill you off the bench." Banda said.

are Sue Allen, Tricia Camus, Chris Cloutier, Lisa Griffin, Trisha Harrity, Liz Janney and Maureen Sutherby, all returning letter winners.

Allen, Cloutier and Griffin have great routines on the floor exercise that shouldn't be missed.

Cloutier and Griffin also take their power and twisting ability, respectively, to the vaulting even where both execute difficult manuvers, like Griffins full twist on, full twist off.

The uneven parallel bars and the balance beam are events that are up for grabs. These have been a problem for the women in the past.

The women will try and put it all together for the start of their season on December 7 when they host the University of New Hampshire, Northeastern, and the University of Connecticut in the UMass Invitational.

Spence starts to show skill

Freshman looks impressive

By PAUL F. DESMARAIS
Collegian Staff

When freshman Cathy Spence made her starting debut with the University of Massachusetts Women's Soccer team in the first round play-off game against Boston College last Saturday, she may have saved her team's hopes for a national title.

Spence got over her first time jitters quickly, as eight minutes into the first half she went one on one with Boston College goalie Kathy Brophy and scored the first and only Minuteman goal of regular playing time.

"I just tried not to panic. They made a mistake, and we took the advantage," Spence said.

For the remainder of the half the offensive unit seemed to go into paralysis. Then with only 16:20 to go in the game, Boston College's Lynne Collins slipped a goal by UMass goalie Jeanne Paul, and the Minutemen's lead was gone. UMass was unable to generate any more offense and the game went into overtime.

UMass beat the Eagles in their last meeting (only one week earlier) 5-0, but B.C. seemed to forget their previous performance. The game proved to be a hard one for the Minutemen. At the games end Cathy Spence admitted to being "tired and beat-up."

Flutie to the USFL? If Donald Trump has his say

By DAN LEBERFELD
Collegian Staff

Donald Trump is one of the wealthiest humans in subsistence. He longed for an Atlantic City casino so he built one (Harrah's at Trump Plaza). He dreamed of the ultimate skyscraper bathed in luxuriam so he built it (Trump Tower in New York). He wanted a professional football team so he bought the New Jersey Generals. He insisted on his team having the best player alive so he signed Hershel Walker. He currently has another fancy to fill. Sources say he wants Boston College quarterback Doug Flutie.

Flutie has said that he wants to try playing in the NFL for at least one season. This USFL billionaire will make it worth Flutie's while to forget about the NFL. A goldmine will be offered. Remember Donald Trump has a good track record for getting what he wants. This soon to be Heismann trophy winner is his current want.

THIS, THAT AND THE OTHER THING

UMass senior middle guard Peter Tracy is like Rasputin, the old Russian who survived poisoning and two gunshot wounds, a tough man to keep down. Earlier in the season he had a brush with death after ripping stomach muscles and losing massive amount of blood. He came back after missing just two games. Since then he has been playing with a bum shoulder that separates constantly. The 6-2, 255 pound Navy transfer is a gutsy individual. Uneasville, Connecticut was a town basking in glory after the performance of two native sons on the football gridiron last Saturday. Brothers Gary and Doug DuBose shined. Gary rushed for 246 yards in leading the University of Connecticut to victory over UMass. Doug rushed for 134 yards to lead Nebraska over Iowa State. UMass corner back Rod Turner was a high school teammate of the galloping DuBose brothers.

1984 UConn graduate John Dorsey, possibly the best linebacker in Yankee Conference history now performs for the Green Bay Packers. Before the season he received the highest compliment a Packer linebacker could get from his coach Forrest Gregg. "He (Dorsey) reminds me of another guy we had here at one time," Gregg said. "I think Nitschke was his name or something like that."

The University of Pacific has the two most imposing offensive tackles on any level in 6-8, 275 pound Steve Smith and 6-8, 270 pound Floyd Layher...The most intimidating defender in the nation has to be Grambling defensive end James Polk, all 6-11, 325 pounds of him.

Two more additions to the collegiate All-Names team. They are Springfield College linebacker Burnell Burrell and Miami's answer to "poetry in motion" wide reciever Stanley Shakespeare...And finally, UMass coach Bob Stull, whose Minutemen have suffered through a long, hard injury plagued 2-7 campaign on how he sleeps at night, "I sleep like a baby, I wake up crying every two hours."

Gymnasts beat alumni; men and women prep for season

By WAYNE SCHOFIELD
Collegian Correspondent

About 300 people packed Boyden Gymnastics Meet where the varsity squads beat the visiting alumni.

But, the fun is over for now and both the men and women are looking forward to successful seasons. The men get started on December 1 when they host Army.

Although the Minutemen lost some excellent gymnasts in the likes of Willie Stevens, Bert Mathieson and Jim Corbett, they still have a very competent group of gymnasts.

Roy Johnson, men's coach said, "the team looks great this year. We've just got a few more areas to strengthen on pommel horse, vaulting and rings."

Senior co-captains Ken Dougherty and Tony Sbarra are expected to hold the men's team together. Dougherty is the number one all around while Sbarra specializes in long-horse vaulting and the high bar.

Top notch peformances are expected from this year's team which is full of depth. Phil Gorgone, Eric Cicerone and Joe Demarco are expected to score high this year in the teams quest to surpass the present record of 262.00 points. The record was set back in 1981 and is in definite jeopardy.

Johnson is optimistic of this year's freshmen and says of one, Roberto Weil, "he is such a positively motivated kid". Weil is expected to excel in the all-around.

Chuck Shiebler, first year coach of the women says, there is "definite improvement from last year skill wise. The women are performing at a point far above last year at this point." Schiebler saw the women last year at the UMass invitational as an assistant at the University of New Hampshire.

Although the team is practicing well, there have been setbacks.

Yael Cantor, a junior who red shirted last season with an injury, may also be lost for this season. Doctors say that Cantor may have torn ligaments in her knee. The incident occurred when she was vaulting in practice.

Abigail Farris, a senior theatre major, has decided to forego gymnastics to pursue her dancing and acting career. She suffered a knee injury two years ago which required an operation and after a long, hard recuperative process she returned last season to compete in the floor exercise event.

Doctors have recommended that she leave gymnastics if she wants to continue her theatrical career. Farris isn't totally abandoning her affiliation with gymnastics or her title as co-captain. Shiebler says Farris will "take on the responsibility of leading the team, help to coach, and use her years of dance to help with choreography."

The outlook for the women is far from glum, however.

Senior co-captain Jennifer Pancoast will compete in the all-around and shoo[t] more extremely well.

Other team members to keep an eye on

Just a few thoughts...

What a way for the Pats to lose. They go to Denver, play a Broneos team that hasn't looked as good as in 1977, the year of the Orange Crush, play 'em tough for the most of the game, then lose it on a fumble by, of all people, Mosi Tatupu. Mosi fumbles once every Haley's Comet, but coughed this one up and Denver went on to score the winning TD...Even so, Mosi is still one of the best backs to watch. He gets more yardage off the second effort than anyone I've seen in a long time. Where do I sign up to be one of Mosi's Mooses?...He and Craig James look to make a fine backfield in the near future for New England. James rushed for 120 yards last Sunday and is improving with each game. The real question is will he make the fans forget Vagas Ferguson; I think so.

That fumble reminded me of one that Giants fans painfully remember. Joe Pisarcik hands off to Larry Czonka's ribs and the Eagles recover and win the game. But it's a new Giants team this year. They've beaten the Redskins once and the Cowboys twice ("America's team" is playing like "Southern New Jersey's team") and are playing the tough D...I, personally, would love to see the Dolphins and 49ers in the Super Bowl. The offense that those two clubs can generate would most definitely make for an enjoyable game.

Well (how do you like my Reagan impersonation), chalk another one up for the Detroit Tigers. Willie Hernandez, already the recipient of the Cy Young, also copped MVP honors, easily outdistancing Kent Hrbek. I betcha if he bought a Boston Herald, he'd win the Wingo...It looks like they're trying to form a rival league in baseball, called the North American Baseball League. They will include a franchise in Mexico City. How much is a million dollars in pesos?

Hoop is getting in full swing as the Celtics look to repeat. They've started off well (3-0) but so have the 76ers (4-0). You wont see better contests than the Celts and Sixers this year...I see former Celtic Rick Robey is out for the year with an operation on his right heel. Ma[y]e they should also remove the bricks from his shot.

In Hockey, Edmonton is still undefeated, but they lost a player due to his contract in Finland. Risto Jalo will be back in February. So if you think Edmonton is good now, wait till the playoffs. Remember that name, if you can pronounce it...Finally, Ball (2-7) State's coach, Dwight Wallace, will not be back next year. Maybe Wallace can get a job with Mondale, they both have a lot of free time.

No more need be said.

UMass funding can be higher

By LAURA YEE
Collegian Staff

The state legislature does not appropriate a proportionate budget to the University of Massachusetts at Amherst because most senators and representatives are not from western Massachusetts, the chairman of the state Board of Regents of Public higher education said yesterday.

"Politicians take care of their own constituents first," David J. Beaubien told the faculty senate.

Beaubien, who also addressed the Professional Association at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, further said that the Legislature must recognize UMass-Amherst as the "flagship institution" out of the state's 29 public institutions of public higher education if the school is to get a better proportion of the state's budget.

The UMass share of the entire higher education budget is "disproportionate" to the allocations of the other state colleges because of its campus size, Beaubien said. He added that UMass could get a larger proportion of the funding if its budget proposals were more organized.

He criticized Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey for not making a "more detailed budget," saying that it lacked adequate distribution and breakdown of needs.

Beaubien, who reports directly to Gov. Michael Dukakis with the needs of all state colleges and universities, said UMass has also been criticized for not retaining top faculty and administrators.

"We've had three chancellors since 1976" and recently lost three top electrical engineering professors. "You offer peanuts and you get monkeys," he said, but UMass must remain competitive in salaries.

Beaubien, who does not forsee any "significant tuition hikes" in the next year, said he "is for" the general education proposal now before the senate, and core requirements.

The Legislature, Beaubien said, must recognize that 50 percent of the state's economy comes from the high tech industry, whose leaders include UMass alumni. Some of the leaders are the chairman of the board at General Electric, chairman of the executive office at Singer and the president of Monsanto, "just to name a few," Beaubien said.

New core plan vote delayed

By LAURA YEE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts faculty senate yesterday moved a step further toward final approval of the General Education plan by passing two of five proposed amendments, although the proposal's final vote may not be made until next semester.

"There's some news that it (general education proposal) won't be voted on until sometime in December," Neil Shipley, senate presiding officer and history professor said. "After today, more motions may be voted in from the history department."

But Robert E. Jones, secretary of the senate, said before adjourning the meeting that he fears the final vote may be delayed until next semester if additional admendments are made or referred back for further discussion.

If passed, the present C,D and E University core requirements would be replaced with coursework in the area of "social world," "biological and physical world," and "analytical reasoning." The general education proposal seeks to give incoming students in the fall of 1986 and thereafter a more well-rounded education.

The senate could not agree on the amendment calling for more than 25 percent of regularly taught courses in a department to satisfy general education requirements.

The amendment that would make all "social world" and "biological and physical world" requirements be taken in different departments was defeated.

The academic matters council said it was against that measure because it would "prohibit students from concentrating in one area."

The senate passed the amendment calling for the subdivision of the "social world" area.

The amendment to require that one of the three biological and physical world courses contain a lab class was passed, but only after a lengthy, heated debate when some professors showed concern about funding and lab space.

John Roberts, a professor of zoology, said the lab component would give "hands on experience in sciences, and a view of how experiments are conducted.

Provost Richard O'Brien said fiscal matters should not be the senate's main concern. "It's nonsense not to have a lab in sciences" he said. "Let's not let economics force us through and consider academics first."

The renaming of "the arts" and "literature and the arts" to "humanities and fine arts" was not voted on time restrictions.

The Noontime demonstraions will be held in front of the Student Union Building and at the Federal Office Building in Springfield today by students mobilized by rumors that a Soviet freighter in the Nicaraguan port city of Corinto was attacked early yeaterday by unidentified PT boats.

The demonstrations were organized last night by about 85 University of Massachusetts students who planned protests against "any U.S. invasion of Nicaragua, and the escalation of American involvement" in that country after hearing rumors of the sonic boom (see story p. 2).

Mobilization for Survival member Gerry Scoppetuolo said that yesterday's emergency meeting yesterday of Western Massachusetts Latin American Solidarity Committee and Radical Student Union members was held because "things got out of hand today. We must address two issues here. One is rumor control, and the other is to decide an adequate wasy to mobilize in case of a real emergency."

A group of students will leave from the Haigus Mall at 9 a.m. today for Springfield's Federal Office Building, and another group will hold a demonstration on the Student Union steps.

Donations sought for Yale workers

By DENISE FULLER
Collegian Correspondent

A group of University of Massachusetts faculty and students is collecting donations today in Herter, Thompson, and Bartlett Hall to benefit the striking technical and clerical workers at Yale University.

"If people can make a small contribution of 10 cents, a quarter, or a dollar per week, it will not hurt people to give that little, but it will amount to a lot of money over the course of time," said sociology Professor Dan Clawson, organizeerr of the financial support group.

The union of 2,600 clerical and technical workers, which is 82 percent women, has been on strike since Sept. 26 when negotiators rejected the administration's final contract offer.

Sandanistas say U.S. 'harassed' Soviet ship

MANAGUA, Nigeria (AP) The Sandinista government said yesterday it was filing its second protest note in two days with the U.S. government, this time complaining about a sonic boom it blamed on a U.S. spy plane.

In a protest note on Wednesday, Foreign Minister Miguel D'Escoto said two U.S. navy frigates and U.S. aircraft "harassed" a Soviet cargo ship when it was seven miles off the Nicaraguan coast. The government has denied U.S. allegations that the ship might be carrying MiG combat planes. The United States denied allegations its aircraft violated Nicaragua's airspace.

A boom shook the capital about 9:30 a.m. Similar booms Oct. 31 were first attributed to bombs, but the government later said they were produced by a U.S. plane flying at supersonic speed. After the Oct. 31 boom, military sources in neighboring Honduras said the plane was a Honduran plane breaking the sound barrier over Honduras.

"It is the same North American spy plane of the SR-71 type that violated Nicaraguan air space last week," said Capt. Rosa Pasos of the Defense Ministry.

The Soviet cargo ship Bakuriani, allegedly harassed by U.S. craft, docked Wednesday at Corinto, 105 miles northwest of Managua, on the Pacific coast. By yesterday it had not been unloaded.

Nicaragua appeared to interpret U.S. concern over possible introduction of Soviet made warplanes in Central America as a prelude to military intervention.

Workers want equity at Yale

Strike continues over minority, women's wages

By DEBORAH ROSS
Collegian Staff

NEW HAVEN — The issue at the heart of the Union of Clerical and Technical Employees (Local 34) strike at Yale University is equity and economic justice, and not just a demand for more money, according to Tom Keenan, a graduate student at Yale.

tant is "really striking and just extraordinary."

Beverly Lett, member of the Local 34 Negotiating Committee, said "we are low paid because we are women," and that male members of Local 34 are similarly low paid "because they are in a woman's profession."

"I think Yale undervalues the work that women do," Ruth Kummir, a Local 34 member who worked at the Yale press before going out on strike said. "Yale is supposed to be progressive, set standards, and uphold values, but their present attitude is really disappointing," she said.

The dispute is the first major collision over the assertion that the job responsibilities of women are undervalued and "we believe what we accomplish will have national implications for all women," Kummir said.

According to Keenan, "Pink-collar workers are the most oppressed and stomped on people," and the strike at Yale "represents the first time this hitherto unorganized sector of the workforce has become organized toward redressing years of exploitation."

William C. Brainard, Yale University provost, told Local 34 members in April that "comparable worth is a national issue that Yale cannot be expected to solve."

The President of Yale, A. Bartlett Giamatti, told the New Haven Register in October that women's jobs are low paid because (women) come late to the labor force because they traditionally raise families, and the fact that they are underpaid "may thus not be claimed as discrimination," he said.

Clawson said the strike provides an opportunity for University students and faculty to lend their support to the issue of comparable worth. If the strike is resolved in favor of the clerical and technical workers, "Yale would send a message to other universities around the country to also address this issue," Clawson said.

Rob Garnett, a graduate student in economics, also sees the importance of student involvement in the strike. Students play a major role in this issue, and "if we could get together and give $60 a week or so, we could make a meaningful contribution," Garnett said.

Sara Lennox, executive board member of the Massachusetts Society of Professors (MSP) and associate professor of German at UMass, urges faculty to assist the strikers.

The MSP and the National Education Association (NEA) are very interested in the strike because the issue raised at Yale is one of solidarity. If Yale can break the strike, we've all lost a lot," Lennox said.

Women say resistance must be non-violent and perpetual

By DEBORAH NEUBAUER
Collegian Correspondent

Individuals must resist oppression by acting on their conscience and their own authority in spite of feelings of helplessness, according to speakers at a women's resistance gathering held last night at the First Congregational church in Amherst.

The gathering "Personal Histories of Resistance," was sponsored by the Peace Traprock Center of Deerfield, and "Not In Our Name," the women's resistance action protesting oppression on Nov. 18 and 19, in New York City.

Each of the four speakers said she had always been a resister and a revolutionary.

"Resistance takes lots of different forms," Felice Yeskel, a feminist-activist, said. Some statements of resistance are unconscious, and may not be recognized as acts of resistance, Yeskel said. "I think when secretaries misfile reports, they're resisting," she said.

Judy Scheckel, a staff member of Traprock Peace Center, said that resistance is always challenging, always diffieult, and always scary. "You go about your daily activities and then all of a sudden the violence and oppression of the reality well up inside until they cause the resistance inside. Then you have to say 'no'," Scheckel said.

The women stated the necessity of non-violent resistance as a way of changing society. "Resistance must be a daily act, and must be exemplified in the way you live your life," Juanita Nelson, lifelong tax resister, said. "There can be not difference between what I say and what I do," said Nelson.

"You have to pay attention to how much toilet paper you use if you want to be a revolutionary," she said.

"Just me living my life the way I want to live it, is resistance," Yeskel said.

Nelson stressed that resistance must be non-violent, perpetual, and must challenge today's economic system as being a vehicle for oppression.

Upcoming events planned by "Not In Our Name" include a non-violence training workshop on Sat., from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. in Earthfoods in the Student Union Building, and room 17 - 19 at Seelye Hall, Smith College. There will also be a women's dance Saturday from 9 p.m. to 1 a.m. at 160 Main Street in Northampton.

BOG condemns entertainer

By JOHN VINCENT
Collegian Staff

The Campus Center Board of Governors last night condemned the racist and sexist comments singer Cliff Meyers directed at a member of the audience Friday night at the Blue Wall.

BOG treasurer Fran Hegeler said the sexist behavior by Meyers was "absolutely inexcusable." Board members said that as a joke Meyers said one of the women near the stage was Portuguese and he suggested that she be "gang-banged."

But rather than banning Meyers, the board directors decided that because it was the singer's first instance of this type of oppression and because Meyers usually brings in a crowd, to merely tell the Campus Center administration to keep an eye open for the rights of students when hiring entertainment. The administration has already spoken to Meyers, according to BOG chairman Bob Abele.

The board also moved to establish a weekly non-alcoholic night at the Blue Wall next semester, where entertainment will be offered. BOG chairman Bob Abele said that when the drinking age rises to 21 next year the Campus Center stands to lose only $30,000 in alcohol sales. He said this could be made up by raising the price of coffee in the Hatch and the Coffee Shop by 2 cents a cup.

The board members passed a motion to make non-school related vendors pay more for the priviledge of selling on the Campus Center Concourse. The vendors will have to pay a 20 percent of all sales to the Recognized Student Organization which invites them in.

Only two of these independent vendors, such as portable stereo sellers, will be allowed on the concourse per day.

Nuclear free Northampton passes

Voters in Northampton Tuesday approved by more than a two-to-one margin a nonbinding resolution calling for that town to be declared a "nuclear-free zone," while Leverett voters passed a referendum urging reduced United States involvement in Central America.

In addition, residents of Sunderland and Leverett voted along with the rest of Franklin County to pass a non-binding resolution seeking an end to U.S. military involvement in Central America by a vote of 16,325 to 9,490.

The nuclear-free resolution, which calls for a ban on production, deployment and storage of nuclear weapons in Northampton, got 9,930 "yes" votes, or 76 percent, to 3,117 "no." It was also on the ballot and passed in Hatfield, Westhampton and Southampton.

Similar resolutions were passed last year in Leverett and Amherst and defeated in Cambridge.

The Central America resolution, which was also on the ballot in Boston, Cambridge and a number of other Massachusetts communities, asks state representatives to push for Congressional and presidential action to remove U.S. military personnel from Guatemala and Honduras, stop supporting the "contra" guerrillas trying to overthrow the Nicaraguan government, and end military aid to El Salvador, Guatemala and Honduras, using that money instead to "create jobs and improve services."

It was approved in Leverett by 605 votes, or 72.6 percent, to 228.

Soviet imperialism unchecked, expert says

By STEVEN SCHRAGE
Collegian Correspondent

The Soviet Union's intervention in the Middle East has increased partly because the superpower is an "imperialist country that so far has not been made to pay the price of its imperialism," according to an expert on international politics.

Speaking Wednesday night to about 100 people in the Campus Center, former adviser to President Reagan and current professor of International Politics at the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy Uri Ra'anan said the United States is also responsible for the Soviet Middle East presence.

Ra'anan said American policy makers need to send clearer signals to the Soviet leaders to keep the Politburo from concluding that there is little risk to intervening militarily in the Middle East.

"Soviet leaders must be made aware that there are some places where the open society is not willing to be pushed, he said.

Ra'anan said the Soviets do not act unless they believe there is little risk of American reaction to the intervention, and American leaders past and present have failed to realize a stronger reaction to Soviet imperialism is needed.

The Tufts professor also analyzed the shift in Middle East strategic balance brought by the introduction of shoulder-fired anti-tank and anti-air precision guided missiles. The increasing technological sophistication of these weapons has made verification of demilitarization a "nightmare," Ra'anan said.

Although he was pessimistic throughout most of his lecture on "The Middle East and the Superpowers," Ra'anan expressed some optimism about peace in Lebanon.

Final solutions can only result from people living together and making fine adjustments over time. History and fate have decreed that two peoples must live in the same area. Can it be done in such a way that they don't kill each other off? I believe the answer is yes," he concluded.

OPINION

The opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the university unless otherwise noted.

Reagan's win

On Tuesday the American people voted for who they felt would best lead this country, and they made the correct choice. Ronald Reagan was re-elected as leader of the free world because Americans believed in his policies, not because they were fooled by his "image." We all voted with our conscience on Tuesday, and our message to Washington was clear; America must continue on its path of economic prosperity and as the leader of world freedom. The 1984 election is now behind us, and we should unite behind Mr. Reagan and support his policies.

In spite of the victory, there is still much work to be done in the field of domestic issues. President Reagan has drastically cut the rate of inflation from over 12 percent under President Carter to 4 percent today. This cut in inflation has greatly assisted all Americans in increasing their purchasing power. A working family earning $25,000 today has $1,500 more in purchasing power than if the tax and inflation rates were still at the 1980 levels. We need to continue this low inflation policy as an important factor in guaranteeing steady economic growth.

Under President Reagan prime interest rates have fell from 21.5 percent to 13 percent today. This drop has led to large increases in productions for the housing industry and new businesses. Yet our economic policy should continue to pressure these interest rates; they need to be lowered further, which provides another goal for this administration.

Peter Dow

In addition, Reagan's tax cuts have helped fuel an entrepreneurial explosion. New incorporations have doubled since 1977, and reached a record of 600,000 new businesses in 1983. Minorities and women are starting these new businesses in greater numbers than the average, according to the Small Business Administration.

In the next four years, we need more across-the-board tax cuts to further stimulate investment, increase the availability of new jobs, and sustain private sector growth.

An important bill now pending in Congress is the enterprise zone proposal supported by President Reagan. This bill would provide tax incentives to businesses who invest in the development of inner-city areas. But this beneficial bill has been blocked by the House leadership (Tip O'Neil) in the weeks prior to the election; now that the election is over, we should all work for and support its passage.

President Reagan has also been instrumental in tax indexing, which assures that higher rates of inflation will no longer raise tax rates, and produce "bracket creep." Many democrats (including Walter Mondale) want to repeal tax indexing, but hopefully Congress will not allow this to happen in the next four years.

Mr. Reagan must also steer the Congress and corporation away from their leaning towards a policy of protectionism. Congressmen, corporate executives, and the media have lately been blaming the trade deficit for the loss of U.S. jobs, thus claiming that the U.S. needs protection from foreign competition. Yet at the very same time the U.S. built up a $69 billion trade debt, unemployment dropped 2.5 percentage points, the sharpest one-year decline in 30 years; and civilian employment was climbing to a record 102 million. The strong U.S. economic recovery has not only drawn in goods from abroad, thereby stimulating recovery among foreign trading partners, but also has generated jobs at home. It is a historical fact that U.S. exports always suffer in order to keep up with the domestic demand during periods of a strong dollar.

The argument for protectionism is more certainly misleading. Protectionism would reduce the flow of dollars abroad that would come back in the form of purchases or investments, no doubt increasing the trade deficit, not reducing it. Thus America should abandon protectionism and should pursue policies that advocate free trade in order to insure world economic growth.

In short, Mr. Reagan's economic policies have been very beneficial for this country. Although his social spending policies have not been examined here, upon investigation these programs can also be well supported. But after Tuesday's election, regardless of your view towards Reagan, we can indeed be proud with the fact that the world's leading democracy has once again peacefully rendered its decision.

Democracy and the CIA

Perry Amsellem
Lisa Sheehy

Recently, the CIA was recruiting on three of the five-college campuses; Interestingly, they portrayed their "services" as if this were just another "means of employment." However, the protests with which they were met at each of the campuses indicate that the students and residents of this valley do not share this "free market" conception of their work.

The CIA activities around the world, but particularly in Central America and in the United States raise one serious fundamental question: Is an agency such as the CIA compatible with the principles of democracy as understood abroad and at home? If the answer to this question were "yes", then myself and Lisa Sheehy would not have been purposefully arrested at Hampshire House (UMass), for criminal trespass on November 5th. The historical and present record shows that the CIA in fact poses a major threat to our democracy at home and abroad. Of course, the basic challenge with which we are met as civil disobedience protestors is, "Well, what about freedom of expression – Don't the students have a right to interview on campus for employment opportunities with the CIA? How are you protecting freedom and democracy at home by infringing on this basic right?" Granted, these are serious questions which demand an honest reply. By first answering our primary question concerning the compatibility of the CIA's present and recent history with those principles fundamental to democracy, we are led to the answers concerning our actions and their effect on students' democratic rights.

Presently, there is a war against Nicaragua, a covert war whose strategies, financing, and arms have been provided for in our name. There is military training, aerial reconnaissance and aerial and land attacks led against civilian men, women, and children of Nicaragua; This is done under the direct oversight and advice of the CIA. Question: What are American citizens working for the CIA doing recruiting people to actively carry out a terrorist military coup against a popularly elected government with which we are legally at peace? This violates the Neutrality Act of 1794, written by the same people who framed our Constitution and the Bill of Rights. No military or para-military activities could be conducted by a U.S. citizen against any country with which the U.S. was officially at peace. Why then, is the CIA contravening those principles which Jefferson, Washington, and Madison actually helped create?

The CIA is an actual threat to our democracy; The Congress and Senate, duly elected to express the popular will of the American conscience has repeatedly refused to renew those funds financing this covert war. The people of America, through their representative democracy, have expressed their will and have withdrawn their support. Thus, the question is, why does the CIA continue to expand their war efforts against Nicaragua?

Not only has the CIA violated domestic law, but, through actions such as mining harbors and publication of pamphlets designed to instruct the Contras on political assassinations of government officials and civilians, the CIA has violated the most basic principles of international law. Finally, the CIA poses as great a threat to U.S. citizens who disagree with the administration's viewpoint as it does to democracy abroad. Since Executive Order number 12333 was signed into law by President Reagan in 1982, the CIA has been given the authority to conduct domestic surveillance of U.S. citizens. If this is not bothersome to you, the fact that they may do so with exception to the 4th Amendment requirements should be: What this means is that the CIA could search and seize your papers, documents, property, even you in your own home without so much as even a warrant. What is most shocking about this is the lack of outrage expressed by the press and the American people.

Our convictions based on the foregoing documented evidence led us to purposefully break the UMass Picket Code and the Massachusetts Statute on Criminal Trespass. Given that the CIA has shown itself to operate in manners totally antithetical to American principles of democracy, why should the University feel obliged to allow these "guests" on campus? Why should students be afforded the comfort of recruiting on campus for a job that destroys our democratic principles here and abroad? Certainly, those students so inclined to work for the CIA can easily find their phone number in any major city phone book, and like other people, call to make an appointment. What ends up being balanced out here is the protection of those principles inherent to our system of democracy against the democratic rights of students to obtain CIA employment information on campus; The CIA role over which we were arrested threatens the very democracy of those who insist on their democratic rights to be interviewed on campus: There is an inherent contradiction in their argument.

US: hands off

"What elections?" a State Department official said at a press conference when asked about the Nov. 4 vote in Nicaragua. Some reporters giggled, and the official went on with the argument that those elections were, purely and simply, a "farce." The Reagan Administration categorically denies that the Sandinistas are moiving toward democratizing their revolution, so that the United States can continue efforts to overthrow them.

The fact that the Sandinistas won only two-thirds of the vote, rather than the 90 percent they anticipated, shows that the elections were not, as Reagan branded them months before they took place, a monolithic "Soviet-style sham." More than four-fifths of the electorate cast ballots – a figure that puts Americans to shame. International observers agreed that that voting was secret and free of coercion and, as an Irish visitor to Managua put it, "as fair as they possibly could be in a country under siege."

As the New York Times put it, this "will not end the struggle for pluralism in Nicaragua." But with regard to American policy, all this is beside the point. Regardless of how this struggle is progressing, there is no justification for United States harassment and intimidation.

The Administration bases its support for anti-Sandinista guerrillas on two major lies.

First is that the Sandinistas are preparing a launching pad for Soviet-backed aggression in the region. Nicaragua, in addition to being at war, is just beginning to rebuild its capital after an earthquake twelve years ago, the late dictator Anastasio Somoza Debayle having spent foreign disaster relief money on himself. Faced with an American blockade on credit and spare parts, the economy is crippled. According to Reagan, this does not stop the Sandinistas from funneling arms to Salvadoran insurgents, though he has offered no evidence.

Ian Polumbaum

Now the president, similarly without proof, says the Soviets are sending "MIG fighter planes to Nicaragua. He raves about "upsetting the balance of power in the region" as if the U.S. has not armed Guatemala, El Salvador and Honduras to the teeth. He would consider MIGs a "very serious" threat, even in the hands of a nation fearing invasion whose warplanes are now largely propeller-driven vessels squatting on the tarmac at Sandino Airport. Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan says MIGs would be "a political statement that this is Soviet-controlled territory." Doesn't this analysis make Israel, Egypt, Pakistan and dozens of other U.S.-armed countries "American controlled territory?"

Second is the notion that the "contras" enjoy popular support. The Central Intelligence Agency advises them to "win the hearts and minds of the people." But the guerrillas follow only the manual's assassination and sabotage guidelines. They attack economic targets – warehouses, coffee processing plants, oil tanks, electricity stations – and disperse. They kill and abduct civilians – six children murdered recently in Nueva Segovia, 1300 abductions in one three-province region alone since the contra war began.

According to the human rights commission in Managua, established under the auspices of the United Nations, rare is a family in northern towns such as Ocotal and Murra which hasn't lost at least one member to the contras. Of the female kidnap victims the commission has been able to talk to, all but one were raped repeatedly in guerrilla camps.

Criticism of the Nicaraguan revolutionary process is to be expected and accepted from an American government. State-sponsored terrorism, rationalized by anti-Soviet hysteria, is not.

Week to educate on apartheid

By MARANN CASSELL
Collegian Staff

In an attempt to educate the public about the struggle against apartheid the South African Education week will be held next week at the University of Massachusetts with slide shows, speakers and movies.

John Rudduck, a member of SCERA's South African Divestment Committee said "historically and presently the issue of Apartheid in South Africa has been of great public interest at the University of Massachusetts and in the five-college area commands."

In 1977 the University of Massachusetts Boards of Trustees ordered the university to divest stock holdings of companies doing business in South Africa, he said. This summer however, researchers at the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) obtained information confirming that the University holds stocks in various companies with significant investment capitals in South Africa.

Since then, a coalition of students have formed SADC to insure full divestiture and to call for accurate monitoring system as well as to educate the campus at large about apartheid. SADC and other groups dealing with human oppression against apartheid in South Africa have gotten a great deal of media support, Ruddock said.

"The week long of events will be a part of a political statement which we feel is necessary at the University. A statement which hopefully will bring to light the tension we feel is necessary to the issues of apartheid and its ramification in South Africa as well as in the United States," Ruddock said.

Ruddock thinks awarding Nobel peace prize to Bishop Desmond Tutu is an acknowledgement to achieved peace in the African nation. "I commend the Nobel peace prize committee in selecting Bishop Tutu. I feel that it is a statement for peace. Bishop Tutu is a man of peace and have advocated peace for all people not just for the people of South Africa." Ruddock hopes Bishop Tutu uses the recognition to show that there is a possibility of reaching peace in the African nations and around the world.

Re-election brings disappointment

By KIMBERLY A. BURGE
Collegian Staff

The landslide victory of Ronald Reagan over Walter Mondale both surprised and scared the majority of University of Massachusetts students. Even though the polls predicted he would win, no one could have predicted he would win by as much as 49 states.

One possible reason for his victory could be that Hispanics, which have traditionally been a Democratic voting bloc, voted for Reagan, according to a story in USA Today. His re-election will mean an increase in the number of Hispanics in Congress, the Nov. 7 article said.

"His campaign was of image, shadows, illusions, and very little reality," said Professor Michael Thelwell of the Afro-American Studies Department at UMass. "I didn't think that he would carry Massachusetts. I thought that the election would be closer."

Tyrone Rachel, an electronic engineering first semester student said he was greatly disappointed Reagan was re-elected. "People seem to have forgotten what he has done. He's cut financial aid and benefits for the poor. I can't trust Reagan," Rachel said.

Hollis Cotton, a communications major, wasn't too pleased with Reagan's re-election either. "His treatment of people of color is not worth mentioning. I disagree with his policies of defense. It's going to be a struggle these next four years with President Reagan sitting behind the desk."

Jodi Coburn, an English major, said Reagan's victory was "embarrassing for all Democrats." She added "I think he's a dangerous man. He hasn't talked to Russia and refused to vote for any legislation for arms control."

Popular party wins in Puerto Rico

By YADIRA A. BETANCES
Collegian Staff

The Puerto Rican Popular Democratic Party took commanding control of the Legislature and wrested control of at least six cities and towns in Tuesday's election for a new governor.

Rafael Hernandez Colon received 998,991 votes or 48 percent while Carlos Romeros Barcelo of the New Progressive Party (PNP) received 444,950 or 44.54 percent, with more votes being counted.

"The Puerto Rican people demonstrated a grand participation in the electoral process," said Miguel Hernandez-Colon, an attorney from Mayaguez, P.R.

Att. Hernandez-Colon, who is no relation to the elected governor, said the PDP's victory "strengthened the ideal of commonwealthood for Puerto Rico," while the PNP's loss weakened the ideals for statehood."

In a telephone interview, att. Hernandez-Colon asserted Barcelos' defeat was influenced by the Cerro Maravilla case in which two independent youngsters were murdered in 1979 while in custody of the police.

He also said the PNP lost accounts to the division among the Puerto Rican Independent Party, and to the corruption during Barcelos' two terms as governor.

"The Puerto Rican people are anxious to have an honest government," Hernandez-Colon said.

He added relations between the United States and Puerto Rico will be "good," because of the capabilities of Jaime Fuster, resident commissioner in Washington.

Luis A. Rodriguez, a UMass Hotel, Restaurant Administration Junior thought Hernandez-Colon took advantage of the Cerro Maravilla case to win the elections.

Rodriguez said the coverage of the Cerro Maravilla case in 60 Minutes Sunday was "a decisive winning point for his (Hernandez-Colon's) campaign." However, he said the PDP had a "well organized campaign" which "paid off."

"If another candidate would have been running in the PNP, (instead of Barcelo), they would have won," Rodriguez said.

Lourdes Hernandez, a senior journalism student does not think Hernandez-Colon "is the leader for this period."

She was displeased by the attitude he took when he was defeated by Barcelo in 1976. "(Puerto rtico) decided over one of the lesser evils," Hernandez said.

"Independence will be the culmination of the commonwealth-hood."

CINEMASCOOP
by Count Ramin Zahed

It is that certain time of year when the average college student suddenly discovers the meaning of depression. Some call it the post election blues. Your love life seems non-existent; you miss your pet chickens, and your roommate is really getting into Twisted Sister. The only remedy can be found in the dim lights of the movie theatres.

I just got back from seeing an excellent double feature at the Amherst Cinema. It seemed ironic to watch Catch 22 and Slaughterhouse Five on the day after the elections, both movies being somewhat related to World War II. Both films warmed the old heart with messages about the evils of war and the nature of man.

Catch 22 has a lot of familiar faces; yet, it is rather choppy and dated. Slaughterhouse Five on the other hand is the perfect George Roy Hill (Little Drummer Girl, Garp) adaptation of Vonnegut's story of an optometrist who trips back and forth in time. The luscious Valerie Perrine and the naive-looking Michael Sacks give the performances of their careers. My favorite line: "Learn to ignore the awful parts of life and concentrate on the good ones."

If your enjoy laughing at Freud as much as I do, you should be delighted to hear that Bud Kort and Carol Kane will be starring in the upcoming The Secret Diary of Sigmund Freud. This new film promises to be a comic spoof on the origins of the Viennese psychologist's theories. It was also relieving to hear that Master Spielberg will be directing Stephen King's The Talisman in the future. This is of course after girlfriend Amy Irving gives birth to their child. Good going, Steve.

Weekend Winners: The American pastorals have finally arrived in the pioneer valley. You have the rich choice between goddess Jessica Lange and superman Sam Shepard in Country and the pure Sally Field in Places in the Heart. Vanity Fair calls these films "pretentiously down to-earth". I call them good stuff.

Remember how we were going crazy over Amadeus in the beginning of the season? Well, it is finally opening at the Hampshire Mall. I hear it's mostly Mozart. Also opening is the light romantic comedy No Small Affair about a lovesick photographer. Now we're really rolling.

Local Loser: Why doesn't George Burns get a job? Who needs a third installment of Aughhh God? Get this man a home. Why don't we tie him up with Brooke Shields and blow them up? Please, no more Gods.

Killer Question: Last week's correct answer was True Confessions. This week's prize, a hot still from Body Double will be awarded to the first enthusiast who can tell me what television show Carol Kane starred in. The photo might help you.

One Last Scoop: The controversial Frankie Goes to Hollywood will be the musical guest on Saturday Night Live. Perhaps if we play our cards right, the long weekend may cure our depressions.

Bud Cort plays Freud and Carol Kane is his devoted wife Martha in the upcoming "Secret Diary of Sigmund Freud."

MICHAEL, YOU'VE GOT TO TALK TO HIM. I WON'T PUT UP WITH THIS ANY LONGER!
J.J., ZONK JUST NEEDS A LITTLE MORE TIME TO SORT HIS LIFE OUT.
SORT HIS LIFE OUT? ALL HE DOES IS LIE AROUND AND EAT! IT'S LIKE LIVING WITH A TEENAGE SON!
J.J., I REALLY THINK YOU'RE OVER-REACTING.
I AM NOT OVERREACTING! IT'S BEGINNING TO AFFECT EVERYTHING, MIKE — OUR WORK, OUR MARRIAGE, EVEN OUR SEX LIFE! DON'T YOU CARE?
OF COURSE, I CARE!
HEY, COULD YOU KEEP IT DOWN IN HERE? I'M TRYING TO WATCH T.V.
I'LL TALK TO HIM IN THE MORNING
GB Trudeau
ZONK, WE'VE GOT TO TALK.
CAN IT, KEEP, MIKE? GILLIGAN'S IN HOT WATER AGAIN.
NO, IT CAN'T KEEP, ZONK. I'VE PUT THIS OFF TOO LONG AS IT IS. IT HASN'T BEEN FAIR TO ANY OF US.
I'M NOT SURE HOW TO SAY THIS, OL' BUDDY. I DON'T WANT YOU TO TAKE IT THE WRONG WAY. THE THING OF IT IS... WELL...
WE WANT YOU OUT!
WE WERE WONDERING ABOUT YOUR PLANS.

Halfback Tony Tobert (412 yards) and fullback Dan Reeder (406 yards) carry the ball most of the time with Gannon also a threat.

UMass needs big games from tailback George Barnwell (777 yards) and the defense as whole if they want to upset the Blue Hens. The secondary, especially free safety Glenn Holden and cornerback Carlos Silva, have looked good lately but UM needs to allow much less than the 438 yards a game they are giving up to win.

On the injury front, UMass is again riddled. Nose guard Peter Tracy, who plays until his shoulder pops out, pops it back in and plays, will not start.

UM one step away from final four

Soccer looks for revenge

By GERRY deSIMAS
Collegian Staff

At stake is a trip to the Final Four next weekend in Chapel Hill, North Carolina when the fourth seeded University of Massachusetts women's soccer team takes on Harvard in a NCAA quarter-final match, Saturday at 1 p.m. at Boyden Field.

Pride is also at stake for UMass for Harvard was one of the two teams to defeat the defending New England champions this year.

"This is our biggest game of the year," co-captain Lori Stukes said. "It will be a real challenge. Everybody is up for the game but nervous too."

The Crimson, 14-2-1, used an Ann Baker goal to take a 1-0 lead and then just sat back, clogged up the middle and held the 13-2-2 Minuteman at bay, earlier this season.

Harvard holds a two game winning streak over the Minutemen dating back to 1983 when Harvard upset UMass 3-2 in overtime during the regular season.

"We want to try and simplify things," coach Kalekeni Banda said. "Defensively, we want to mark up a little better and get some more team defense. The offense will take care of itself.

"We've been a little too nice and let the other teams feel too comfortable. We have to be a little more mean, mentally. We'll have to play with mental aggressiveness," he said.

The Minutemen will also be looking to score the first goal so they can dictate the tempo of the game. In the three games UMass has been scored upon first, UM is 1-2.

The Crimson, led by leading scorer Kelly Landry (15 goals), is a team that moves the ball upfield fast and with speed. They used their speed last game to bottle up UMass in the second half.

"We respect Harvard," Banda said. "They have a lot of speed. We don't want to leave them open for any easy goals. We have to deny them the ball in their half of the field."

Harvard coach Bob Scalise respects the Minutemen. "With overall talent, UMass is the superior team. On any given day, I feel that we are capable of beating anybody," he said.

Crimson goalie Tracee Whitley, a freshman, will be under pressure to come up with another big game. UMass outshot Harvard 14-3 last game.

Senior co-captain Chris Taggart and Stukes, making their last home appearances, are both All-Americans players.

"The team is really psyched up for the game," Stukes said. "We really want to go to the Nationals." Last year UMass finished third in their first Final Four appearance.

Field Hockey visits UConn

By ED HAYWARD
Collegian Staff

The second season for the University of Massachusetts field hockey team begins with the same opponent that ended the first, the University of Connecticut.

The Minutemen face the Huskies in a first round NCAA playoff game tomorrow in Storrs at 11 a.m. with the winner to battle with fourth seeded New Hampshire in Storrs on Sunday for the right to go to the Final Four to be held next weekend in Springfield.

The Huskies, 14-3 on the year, knocked off UMass 2-1 in a come from behind win last Saturday in Storrs, extending the UMass winless streak against UConn to five games, dating back to 1981.

UMass, 13-4, is shooting for their second consecutive Final Four appearance while UConn is looking for their fourth straight trip.

But the only game that matters now is the UConn game, according to UMass coach Pam Hixon.

"It's a do-or-die time, tomorrow," Hixon said. "We win or we go home and if we start thinking about the next game (UNH), we're never going to get there."

"We've played them before so we know what to expect," Hixon said. "We have to play the best we can and have to sustain our play for 70 minutes. If we do that, nobody can beat us. But we have to play consistently for the whole game."

The Minutemen, who lost to UConn in the NCAA title game in 1981, 4-1, have left Saturday's loss alone, Hixon said.

"We laid down our plans for tomorrow's games and know what we have to to. We've left the last game alone. Hopefully it will serve as a learning experience for tomorrow," she said.

UMass midfielders Pam Moryl and Megan Donnelly will work to control the transistion game and the flow of the game, Hixon said. Forwards Tonia Kennedy, the team's leading scorer with 13 goals, Chris Kocot and Judy Morgan will spearhead the offense.

"We're going to have to work the ball out of our defensive territory and reduce the number of turnovers," Hixon said. "We must build up our attack in the midfield and work the ball down with two or three forwards moving in as a unit."

The UMass defense should have their hands full with the speedy UConn forwards including Wendy Hug, the all-time leading Huskie scorer, and Tracey Fuchs. Hixon expects a wide open back and forth battle.

The Minutemen will have to exploit the weak UConn backfield, but the biggest problem facing the UMass offense is UConn All-American goalie Terry Kix, 36-4-2 over the last four years. Kix made 17 saves last week against the Minutemen.

"With their weak defense, we're going to have to attack all the time," Hixon said. "We'll have to make Kix play a lot of balls. We know she's going to make saves on good shots but we must shoot to create more opportunities. We must be persistent."

And looming in the future is a Sunday match with 16-2-1 UNH if UMass wins. UMass, though, has never won a first-round NCAA playoff game, losing to Iowa, 1-0 in 1982.

Their pride's at stake...

Stumping football at Delaware

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

If indeed anything can make up for a losing season defeating the University of Delaware would go a long way in mending the wounded pride of the University of Massachusetts football team.

The Minutemen, 2-7, have played the Blue Hens eight times and have come away losers eight times. Delaware, 6-3, has outscored its last two opponents 132-23 including a 76-0 pasting of hapless Morgan State last Saturday.

"I'm sure the fact they're playing Delaware is a little added incentive," UMass coach Bob Stull said. "But the main incentive is a win, we haven't had one of those for a while."

Six games to be exact. It was September 29 when last the Minutemen won, 3-0 over Northeastern. Since then they've come close...but.

"It's no single person or aspect of the game," Stull said of the losing streak. "We just can't work together as a team. The offense will score and instead of bearing down the defense lets up and the other team scores on us. Or the defense causes a turnover and the offense runs three plays and punts."

Stull also said that junior quarterback Jim Simeone will start the game and give way in the second period to freshman Mike Trifari (3 of 5 on the season). The coaches will then make a decision at half-time for the rest of the game.

"It's not that Jimmy's doing poorly," Stull said. "He's improving a lot in the past three games, but he just isn't making the big play and at this point we need the big play."

Delaware boasts what Stull said maybe the best team the Minutemen will face all season. With games against Holy Cross, Boston University and Rhode Island under their belt, a loss of major proportion may be on the way for the Minutemen.

"We've got a lot of players hurt, they have a great team offensively and they're tough at home. We'll just go at them, play hard and hope for the best," Stull said.

The Blue Hens are led by sophomore quarterback Rich Gannon. Gannon, a dangerous runner with good speed, has completed 55 percent of his passes and looks to receivers Guy Darienzo and Bob Norris often.

Protesters rap US 'aggression' vs. Nicaragua

By TOM MIDDLETON

SPRINGFIELD — About 50 people, most of them UMass students, picketed in front of the Federal Bulding for two hours in protest of Reagan Administration policies toward Nicaragua.

The group started on the steps of the UMass Student Union Building at a noontime rally attended by about 300 people. After speeches by former Congressional candidate Mary Wentworth and others, about 150 protestors walked to the Amherst Common, many holding hands and chanting in a line 50 yards long.

At the common, the protestors held hands, formed a circle and sang, "All we are saying 's give peace a chance." At 1:30 p.m. a car pool was formed to bring protestors to the Federal Building in Springfield.

Throughout the day participants chanted, "U.S., C.I.A. out of Nicaragua," English and Spanish versions of "The people united will never be defeated," and other slogans.

The afternoon-long protest was organized Thursday night by a coalition of student groups after rumors spread that the U.S. had bombed a Soviet freighter in the Nicaraguan port of Corinto. The rumors were false, but protest organizer Todd Little said the Associated Press had confirmed "harassment" of the Soviet ship by U.S. Navy boats and American intelligence flights over Nicaragua.

The Reagan Administration has said that if the Soviet shipped MiG-21 fighter planes to Nicaragua it would be a "very serious" threat to regional security. U.S. intelligence sources have since reported that no warplanes were on board the Soviet ship, as Administration officials speculated last week.

In her speech at the student union Wentworth said, the Nicaraguan government has "not only a right, but a responsibility to the Nicaraguan people to defend itself" against U.S. backed guerillas and American mining of its harbor.

The Reagan Administration repeatedly has asserted that Nicaragua is supplying weapons to rebels in El Salvador. Wentworth said the main supplier of arms to the rebels is the U.S.. Nicaraguan soldiers use Soviet AK-47 rifles, Salvadoran rebels use American M-16 rifles because they can capture them from the army or buy them on the black market, she said.

Nicaragua is buying weapons from many countries around the world, including France, she said. "Nicaragua is not dependent on the Soviet Union and they don't want to be dominated by another superpower after years of U.S. domination," she added.

Yale group calls for three day general strike

Plans 'moratorium' despite renewal of negotiations

By LAURA KOESTER
Collegian Staff

A Yale University group will call a three day general strike this week despite the renewal of negotiations between the union and the administration, according to graduate student Tom Keenan.

Last week the Coalition to End the Strike, a group of students at Yale, sent a proposal to both parties urging them to renew negotiations.

On Friday the union accepted the offer and called on the administration to negotiate.

The administration accepted and met yesterday with the union.

Union negotiating committee member Steve Fortes described the meeting as "positive," but said the general strike, or "moratorium," planned for Wednesday would still occur.

Local 34 spokesperson Deborah Chemoff said the coalition has demanded that "Local 34 and the administration engage in daily negotiations, that both sides make specific compromises over outstanding issues and that each side adjust their financial package, that both parties keep the Yale community informed on the progress of contract negotiations by allowing non-participating observers to attend negotiating sessions, and both sides seriously consider binding or non-binding arbitration or fact finding."

Coalition says students and faculty will create an "alternative university" during the three-day moratorium.

The coalition, in conjunction with the union, is planning a moratorium on classes and will ask students not to use university facilities or participate in university activities, Chernoff said.

In a letter submitted to Yale President A. Bartlett Giamatti, the union stated "we are willing to compromise significantly to achieve a settlement. It is in the best interests of all concerned to settle the strike."

Tom Keenan, a graduate student at Yale, said student support and enthusiasm for the moratorium has been "phenomenal," although some parts of the community, such as the science departments, are "recalcitrant."

Keenan said students and faculty will create an "alternative university" during the three-day moratorium.

He said various schools and departments within the university will be teaching seminars on labor issues.

"Everyone is utilizing their areas of expertise and professional knowledge," Keenan said.

Also, visitors such as activist Barry Commoner, author Michael Harrington and members of the national women's movement have been invited to the campus on Friday, Keenan said.

A National women's committee to support the strikers at Yale was recently formed by members of national women's organizations. Some of these women are Judy Goldsmith, president of the National Organization for Women, Judy Licktman of the Women's Legal Defense Fund, Karen Nussbaum, president of Nine to Five, Shirley Sandage of the Older Women's League, Joyce Miller, president of the Coalition of Labor Union Women and Bella Abzug, former U.S. Representative from New York.

Career Day 1984 to be biggest ever

By STEPHEN HIGGINS
Collegian Correspondent

The Undergraduate Business Club at the University of Massachusetts will sponsor its largest Career Day ever, featuring speakers and recruiters from 30 companies and a new "career fair", tomorrow at 10 a.m. in the Campus Center.

Career Day 1984, organized in three sections, is open to students in all majors, according to Jeff Solomon, the club's president.

Twenty five representatives from accounting, banking, marketing, and high-tech firms will conduct question and answer sessions to give students information and advice on finding careers. The sessions will run from 10 a.m. to noon in various rooms on the first floor of the Campus Center.

At noon, all students are invited to attend a luncheon in room 1009 of the Campus Center.

Oregon sniper kills Olympian

EUGENE, Ore. (AP)—A sniper armed with two high-powered rifles opened fire at the University of Oregon's stadium Monday, wounding a student and killing a former Olympic athlete before fatally shooting himself, police said.

The man, who wore combat fatigues and ahd blackened his face, fired so many shots during the 3 //2-hour siege at Autzen Stadium that officers could not count them, said police Sgt. Eric Mellgren. His body was found under a section of seats at the stadium.

"There were too many too fast to count," he said.

Police identified the sniper as Michael E. Feher, 19, of Everett, Wash., a University of Oregon student.

Feher wounded a student wrestler outside the stadium weight room and shot the former Olympic athlete to death on a nearby bike path before turning a rifle on himself shorly after noon, said police Sgt. Tim McCarthy.

Chris S. Brathwaite, 35, of Eugene, who competed for his native country, Trinidad, as a sprinter in the 1976 and 1980 Olympic Games, was found dead on a bicycle path near the stadium about 11:30 a.m., police said.

Brathwaite graduated from the University of Oregon in 1976 and had been running for the Oregon International Track Club.

Mellgren said police, including 12 tactical officers also wearing fatigues and blackened faces, fired no shots during the siege.

The wrestler, identified as Rick O'Shea, 22, was taken to Sacred Heart General Hospital, where he was in stable condition suffering from wounds to the shoulder and buttocks, Mellgren said.

Cartoonist changes work

BOSTON (AP)—A campus cartoonist said Monday that he'll bow to the will of angry student newspaper editors, stop drawing a comic strip that depicted Reagan's assassination—and draw political cartoons instead.

Kent Danish, the pseudonym for the cartoonist, who declined to give his real name, said he expected his comic strip "Flying 'Ish" to "get axed" at a Monday night editorial meeting of the Boston University Daily Free Press because of the stir caused by last Thursday's comic.

The comic showed President Reagan hit by a hail of bullets above the caption "Justice."

Danish said he drew the cartoon because "I was miffed, I was peeved Reagan won the election.

"I suppose I could have said, 'Gosh, four more years.' But I was so fed up with the American political system that it seemed like the only way to get things done was to make a loud, rancorous statement."

Nicaraguan army on full combat alert

MANAGUA, Nicaragua (AP) — The Sandinista government, following up its warnings of a U.S. invasion, deployed tanks in strategic areas in and around the capital Monday and put its armed forces on combat alert.

In a communique read over nationwide radio at 5:30 a.m., 6:30 a.m. EST, the Defense Ministry announced the state of alert ordering troops to be ready to move anywhere at anytime.

Although the communique did not mention the United States by name, Nicaraguan officials over the past two weeks have insisted that a U.S. invasion is "imminent."

U.S. State department spokesman John Hughes, accompanying Secretary of State George P. Shultz to a meeting of the Organization of American States in Brasilia, Brazil, said the talk of an invasion was "absolute nonsense."

"A state of alert has been ordered in all the national territory for all permanent combat units on land, sea and air, reserve units and the Sandinista militias," The Nicaraguan communique said.

It also announced the deployment of armored and mechanized units of land forces based in the capital and said reserve troops and militia in the Managua area would receive combat assignments.

The communique urged citizens to report to civil defense brigades and take part in defense operations organized by the fire department, the Red Cross and the health, construction and other ministries.

In a separate communique, the civil defense high command cited the "seriousness of the threats of military aggression the Nicaragua is experiencing" and issued an urgent call for all citizens to be prepared for an attack.

Associated Press reporters and photographers saw at least 20 Soviet-made T-55 tanks, 15 of them patrolling in a northern industrial sector and others near the country's only oil refinery, west of Managua, and on roads southeast to the city of Masaya and to the southwest.

The Sandinista newspaper Barricada published front-page photographs of atillery units and civilians reopening trenches.

Managua policemen who spoke with The Associated Press on condition they not be identified said they were mobilized Sunday night.

Hampshire attacks high energy costs

By TIM RYAN
Collegian Correspondent

Hampshire College students formerly paid the price for attending the only college in the U.S. heated solely by electricity, but administrators have now started several projects to conserve energy and save students money.

Last semester, for example, each student was required to pay a $500 surcharge because fuel costs became so high. According to Thomas Leue, energy conservation manager at Hampshire, "approximately $1,000 of a student's total bill each year goes to pay for fuel costs."

The college recently installed 50 propane-burning boilers providing heat for the three largest buildings on campus; the Cole Science Building, Johnson Library, and the Robert Crown Gymnasium.

Leue said these boiler were installed because "propane burns more cleanly and our burners are approximately 90 percent efficient." The total cost for this project was $400,000 and is expected to save $100,000 in its first year of operation.

Also installed were two co-generators. These are large automotive engines coupled with other generators which run on propane and they provide the Dining Commons and Dakin and Merrill Halls with hot water and heating.

"These co-generators," Leue said, "are almost as efficient as the ones used by the local power companies."

This program is expected to save $91,000 in its first year, while its total cost was about $140,000

A third project has begun which uses "super-insulation" in Enfield, the college's modular living area. Although Leue said he did not know exactly how much money was spent, he did say that the insulation providing triple thickness protection to the roof and walls was estimated to save students about 80 percent of present fuel costs.

Only four buildings have been super-insulated, but three to four buildings will be sealed each year until the entire complex is completed.

In addition, two smaller energy projects are scheduled for completion this semester.

One is a new glass wall, measuring 200 feet by 28 feet, which will replace the existing one around the college swimming pool. More heat can be retained Leue said, because the new glass contains microscopic metal particles.

Movement-sensitive lights are also being place in rooms which are used only periodically. The lights will serve a dual purpose of energy efficiency and security because they will only turn on when there is movement in the room.

Activities listing now offered

The Commuter Area Government is organizing a service that will give University of Massachusetts students information on upcoming events and activities taking place in the five college area. The Activities Phone will supply up-to-date listings, times, dates and locations of events.

Only non-profit organizations, including Registered Student Organizations (RSO), graduate student groups and UMass academic departments, will be listed on the phone service. Free activities will have priority over events that charge admission and regular meetings will not be included. However, some introductory and special meetings may be listed.

Organizations that wish to list information on the service must submit information two weeks before the scheduled event to the office in 404 Student Union Building or by calling 545-4474.

Smith honors abolitionist

Smith College will celebrate the opening of its new admission office with a dedication ceremony on Sunday afternoon.

The office, which was recently relocated to West Street in Northampton to give workers more space and greater reception and waiting room area for students and parents, will be named for the family of William Lloyd Garrison, the reknowned American reformer whose newspaper, the Liberator, was influential in helping sway public opinion toward the abolition of slavery in the United States.

The new site was formerly the home of Captain Samuel L. Parsons.

To celebrate the opening of the new offices, Smith president Jill K. Conway will dedicate Garrison Hall at 2:30 p.m.

In collaboration with the dedication, the college will open a month long exhibition of the Garrison Family papers in the Alumnae Gymnasium on the day of the dedication.

The exhibition will consist of thousands of letters, photographs and memorabilia of the family's involvement in politics, business, art, education, literature, religion and reform movements. The papers are part of the Sophia Smith collection, Smith's women's history archive.

Car thefts reported

A 1965 Ford Mustang, valued at $3200, was reported stolen at 6:30 p.m. Thursday from lot 44, University of Massachusetts police reported. The owner told police the car had been locked and there are no clues as the investigation continues.

A car parked in lot 44 was broken into and two speakers valued at $110 were stolen, police reported. The right window was smashed and the car's dashboard was damaged, causing $290 in damage in the incident, which was reported at 1:48 p.m. Thursday.

Police said a hit-and-run accident in lot 21 caused $175 in damage to a car's right quarter panel. The incident took place between Nov. 6 and Nov. 8.

Police reported that a 19-year-old UMass student was arrested at 8:45 p.m. Thursday for a warrant issued by the MDC police for breaking a window in a state commonwealth-owned building.

Paul Paulson, former president of Doyle, Dane Berbach, Inc., a leading advertising agency, will deliver a keynote address there.

A "career fair", a new component of the event, will begin at 2 p.m. in Campus Center rooms 162-164. Thirty companies will maintain booths where students can obtain information from representatives about prospective careers. Video presentations and booklets will also give information about the companies and jobs.

The Business Club expects to lose money on the event, which will cost several thousand dollars, mostly for accomodations for the companies' representatives.

But Solomon said the club feels positive about the money loss because "we want to try to make it an annual event. We got 30 employers this year, and we want 60 for next year."

Little said, "This is a classic show of arrogance that Reagan is characterized by. I think we should take this very seriously."

"Not only do we have to stop this nonsense going on in Central America, we have to stop it because it is our government causing it," Wentworth said, adding that the Reagan administration cannot continue its policies in Central America "without mass uprising."

Signs reading "U.S. hands off Latin America" and "Stop U.S. Aggression" were painted along the route to the Federal Building. At the building the protestors caused traffic to slow down and people to look out of their windows.

Jim Harney, who recently returned from El Salvador, said "The irresponsibility of the press" is to blame for the "support of another four years of Reagan." Speaking about Reagan's re-election, Harney said, "People only vote about pocket books."

We should not support terrorism in Nicaragua

Marc Kenen

On election day it was announced that a Soviet freighter had docked in a Nicaraguan port and was suspected of carrying MIG fighter jets. With this announcement came stern warnings from the Reagan regime as to the unacceptability of MIG jets in Nicaragua.

It is an internationally accepted principle that every country has the right to protect themselves. War is being waged against Nicaragua by the United States through the contras, our warships have lined the coast of Nicaragua for months and United States military exercises are continuous throughout Honduras. The Nicaraguan people have the right to arm themselves against this aggression. To view the acquisition of MIG jets in Nicaragua as an aggressive move by them (or the Soviet Union) against their neighbors is a manipulative lie being used in the same vein as the Tonkin Gulf resolution. Because the Reagan regime treads on no moral ground it is forced to scare the American people into supporting further military aggression.

What the Reagan regime does not realize is that there are millions of Americans who learned from the Vietnam war. We will not be duped with red scares. We know the Nicaraguan people are our friends and pose no threat to neighboring peoples, much less our own national security. And what the Reagan regime and the right all across the country must understand is that not only do we support the right of self-determination of the Nicaraguan people, but that their revolution is an inspiration and guiding light in our lives and we have a very large stake in its survival.

There is no way that the Reagan regime will defeat the Nicaraguan people. They can napalm the entire country, quarantine the coast line, starve them, murder them, commit genocide, but Nicaragua will not be conquered just as the people of Vietnam were never conquered. It is time for the North American people to rise up on the side of freedom and self-determination. We are not an evil people. But we are a very confused, manipulated nation facing the same responsibilities and decisions of those in Germany in the 1930s. Do we play passive and enjoy the selfish fruits of economic prosperity for a few while millions perish at the hands of our government? Or do we take history into our own hands, rise up and stop this madness that threatens not only Nicaragua but the entire world?

For many of us the choice is clear and we are prepared for the long struggle ahead. The Nicaraguan people are ready to defend their homeland to the death and it is up to all of us to join in solidarity with them. Let the right be put on notice. In the face of military aggression against Nicaragua, business will not be as usual. We have the power to stop the administration and we will. Make no mistake about it. The people will speak, just as we spoke against the Vietnam War. Only this time it won't take us a decade.

It is still unclear as to the path this escalation will take. Up to this point the Reagan regime has been too gutless to send North Americans in to fight. It is easier, and safer (in an election year especially) to let others do their dirty work for them. And they still might choose to pursue this cowardly course. But with the election over there is no risk involved anymore. And we have no electoral control. All we have are each other and the power of our minds, our souls and our numbers. If there's ever been a time in history where we've needed to pull together, it is now. For the sake of the Nicaraguan people and for the sake of world peace we must lock arms and spirits together and prepare for the fight. We must be ready to act, swiftly and united.

There have been thousands of North Americans visiting Nicaragua since the revolution and they all seem to come back with a similar message. The Nicaraguan people understand the difference between the North American people and the Reagan regime. They know we are their brothers and sisters. Please, let us not betray their trust. The time to act is now. Let the world know that we will not support genocide...Join us! Groups are organizing here on campus, around the valley and all over this troubled land. Get involved today. There might not be a tomorrow.

Rumor has it...

Last Thursday was a day that many University of Massachusetts students may never forget, no matter how hard they try.

It was a day that started off for most people just like any other ordinary day. It ended with many people not knowing whether they would wake up the next morning still alive and with their country still at peace.

It was a day on which some thought it would only be a matter of hours before it would officially be announced that the ship suspected of carrying MIGs in Nicaragua had been bombed and that the United States had been responsible for that act of war.

Cris Schuster

It was only a rumor, a cruel and frightening rumor, but it woke up many students to the true horror of an imminent war.

Where the rumor began, no one knows. But after it was confirmed by the New York Times and the Washington Post that troops were being mobilized, the rumor began to become more and more credible and more and more frightening.

Peoples' faces as they waited for confirmation of the rumor on the radio, as they called people who might have been able to either confirm or deny the rumor, as they asked everyone they knew if they had heard the latest, spoke volumes. This was no laughing matter and no one took it that way. Everyone's future was at stake.

It's easy to say now that there was no way the rumor could have been true. But looking at it a little less rationally and a little more emotionally, it wasn't so hard to believe it. It was feasible. Reagan had just won the presidency with a landslide victory. He had received a "mandate." It seemed as though he truly believed the people backed him up on his policies. The situation in Nicaragua was and still is extremely tense. And it wouldn't have been the first time the United States had committed an act of war.

It seemed as if it were the Cuban Missile Crisis all over again. Both the Soviet Union and the United States were involved again. Again, the United States gave the Soviet Union an ultimatum. During the missile crisis, Kennedy ordered a blockade and was prepared to go further if the Soviets didn't back down and remove the missiles. This time, Reagan has warned the Soviets to call back their ship without unloading it, and he has ordered several major maneuvers in Georgia and Honduras. Some of us believe Reagan is fully capable of ordering the ship to be bombed if it doesn't return home.

Was that rumor really so unfeasible? Is it really so unbelievable that we might find ourselves at war in Central America?

Thursday was a day that made many of us step back and really look at the direction we and our government areheading towards. It's scary. Nicaragua is preparing for war and so are we. War just may be on the horizon for us.

Up until last Thursday, I really believed we had a future and that no one would be so silly as to declare war on us. But now I'm not so sure. I woke up Friday and realized exactly what I've got to lose, how many things I still want to do with my life and how many friends of mine might end up going to fight in Nicaragua and never come back. I woke up and realized I can no longer be apathetic and think peoples' common sense is going to keep us out of war. It's going to take a lot more than that.

Thursday it was only a rumor. Next time we might not be so lucky.

Random notes—

Losing a little face

Senator Paul Tsongas, where is your conscience?

A week and a half ago, you were on TV telling us you should be succeeded by John Kerry who supports the nuclear freeze and opposes U.S. military involvement in Central America, rather than Ray Shamie, who endorses President Reagan's violent policies.

Now you say that if Nicaragua imports crates of MIG fighter parts from the Soviet Union, there's no alternative but for the U.S. to "bomb those crates."

Evidently you've decided not to close out your career by seeing through the Reagan Administration's lies, the false hype of a threat to our security and the crass assumption that a small Central American country has no right to defend itself against terrorism our government is sponsoring.

You don't want to be remembered as a voice for sanity, speaking out against a policy that threatens to lead us into a bloody war against the people of Nicaragua.

Instead, perhaps you want to go down in history as did all but two members of Congress by voting for the 1964 Tonkin Gulf Resolution, as just another senator who jumped on the warpath.

Or do you?

Re-thinking your position would cause you to lose a little face. Not doing so would cause you to lose a lot of respect.

The nerve of some

I was standing in line the other day waiting to vote in precinct four, and I overheard someone say to another person that they thought it was stupid how the handicapped had the advantage of going before everyone else. There were about 200 people waiting in line and only two people in wheel chairs went to the front of the line. I think that it takes a lot of nerve for someone to say that, because they are not grateful enough for not being handicapped.

THE COAT-TAILER

Oh, the humanity

Rita Murphy

Thursday I had two midterms. One I did poorly on, the other I did very poorly on. But Thursday was one of the most interesting days of my life.

Thursday I became a Republican.

The envelope was normal enough; white if I remember correctly. It had my name on it and my address. The return address was the College Republican National Committee.

Oh, God, what could they want with me? My hands trembled. I held the envelope oh, so cautiously. Were they suing me for libel? Were they upset I called UMass a "beacon of liberalism?" Was it a letter bomb, set to go off in my face just because I called one of "them" a misguided fool who walked around with his finger up his crotch while his fellow conservatives turned back the clock on 200 years of achievements in civil rights?

The sweat poured down my face. I was shaking. I pulled the letter from the envelope. Wait, I thought. I knew it, I knew why they were after me. I don't want to pay back a $200 million deficit. They're upset with me. They think I'm selfish because I would rather see the defense budget go to Ethiopia? They think I'm un-American. That's gotta be it, I thought, anticipating a harsh-worded letter from Paul Laxalt.

I grasped the letter. "Dear Rita Murphy, welcome to the College Republican Movement."

Ahhhhh, why couldn't it have been a warrant for my arrest? A death certificate with my name on it? A bill from the Bursar's Office for $200 because of an increase in in-state tuition retroactive to 1951? A letter from my history teacher telling me to give up because I'll never pass? A free sample of Tylenol, without the safety seal? Yes, Lord, I'm a College Republican.

Rita Murphy is a Collegian columnist.

Or maybe it was a letter condemning me for protesting on the Capitol three years ago. I knew I shouldn't have had my picture taken in front of that big white building, holding a "U.S. out of El Salvador sign."

Maybe it was a letter from Ronnie himself telling me I was a communist because I support a mutually-verifiable nuclear freeze. Oh, God, I knew I shouldn't have written that letter to my U.S. Representative telling him to either veto the MX or face the wrath of my fist.

What could the letter be? I mean, I'm a good American, I thought to myself, just because I believe a woman should be able to control her own body, just because I'm one of those damn feminists who, for some God-forsaken reason, believes women should be guaranteed equality in the Constitution, just because I want my children to pray at the dinner table, and not at school lunches, just because I believe our government should take care of the elderly regardless of cost, just because I think Solomon is an asshole who wouldn't know a draft from a breeze; I mean, why would the Republicans want to get me?

I couldn't take it anymore. Thirty-two seconds of wondering, of worrying, of shaking was enough. I opened it. Yes, I say to you all, I admit it. I opened a letter from the Republican National Committee.

It's morning for Mondale

John Kenney

It's morning in America. A morning unlike any other he has seen in many years. Because this morning is different for him. On this morning his fight is over. And he has been beaten badly.

Walter Mondale has spent more than 20 years in public service. He has been on a campaign trail that has taken him all across this country, and back again. And every day of it he has talked about the same things: a world of real peace, of equal rights for every one, of caring for other people. And Tuesday, when it really mattered, no one cared.

But now there is a burden off of his shoulders. For all of his political career he has carried with him the voice of Americans in need. And on his toughest battle, this past year and a half, he let people know that they still count. And that women are an important part of our society. The older people and black people and children are important. Because Walter Mondale realizes that there are people who need help.

It was a tribute to Mondale to run with Geraldine Ferraro. Finally someone had the guts to look beyond sex and choose a person on his or her qualifications. And throughout the campaign Gerry Ferraro was a voice of strength and reason.

Walter Mondale did not lose this race for the presidency. America lost the chance for real leadership. He told people that we need a change in America; that too many people in this country are treated unfairly and that as one of the most powerful nations on the planet we must talk about a peaceful future rather than build more weapons.

He also realizes that we can't spend money we don't have. And that the sad reality of our life is that we have to pay back the enormous debt we owe before we continue spending insanely.

And yet people listen to the myths that Ronald Reagan tells about how a government can be run. People want to believe that life in America is good. In the short term, perhaps it is. But America is not a country that plans for the short term.

And perhaps what is most tragic about this election is the very reason it was won. It wasn't catchy political commercials. It wasn't precise marketing data. And it wasn't the pollsters. The reason this election was won is because of selfishness. Ronald Reagan spoke about selfishness during this campaign and it hit a very taut nerve in the American public. We cannot be a nation that asks what can be done for us. But a selfishness has swept across this country during the past four years. Under the guise of leadership of a man who doesn't understand the world he lives in, we as a nation have forgotten to care about anything other than ourselves.

In four years Reagan made priorities in this country. But elderly people weren't one of those priorities. Neither were women. Or Black people or Hispanic people. Or students.

Walter Mondale had the audacity to talk about the responsibility that we all share. A responsibility to other people. To take care of the poor, the handicapped, the sick. Two weeks ago at a rally in Boston, Mondale spoke of what it is like to live in Ronald Reagan's America.

"If you're poor or sick, tough luck. If you're Black or Hispanic or a woman, you're out of luck. And if you're handicapped, you shouldn't be."

The polls were clear. Ronald Reagan would win a landslide victory. But the logic wasn't clear.

It's morning in America. Reagan's America. But the rest of the day has a very bleak forecast.

Letters to the Editor—

Name-calling is tasteless

This letter is not in response to any article in particular, but to a trend that has only recently manifested itself in Monday's Collegian in the articles written by William Spain (liberal viewpoint) and Stephen Erickson (conservative viewpoint).

In the two years that I have been at UMass it appears many of the articles and letters written by liberals are filled with derogatory attacks. Spain calls Reagan a '...living relic from the past' an 'old guy' and claims that we back 'scumbags'.

Erickson, on the other hand, uses no descriptors, let alone degrading remarks when referring to Mondale-Ferraro-Carter or the Democrats in general. Of course, letters like the ones stated above are biaded by nature, but to resort to name calling detracts from the content of the article, indicating (to me anyway) that no logical points are avaulbie to be dicussed. In addition, it shows a lack of taste. Liberals are not alone in this technique, it is just that the conservatives do it much less often.

Having both liberal and conservative viewpoints (in this case I am not for Reagan, although I am not too thrilled with Mondale either) I feel objective in presenting my case. It is my hop that we can have both presented logically.

Opening our eyes to communist aggression

This is in reference to the Collegian's coverage of the inaccurate rumor that we bombed a Soviet ship off Nicaragua on Friday. I saw the photo of two people standing behind a "U.S. Bombed the Soviet Ship Alert" sign. What's going on here? We had a P.T. boat surveying a Russian freighter which was carrying, as Nicaragua's Foreign Minister stated on Good Morning America "certain items." We also had a spy plane fly overhead. Is that new? Is that reason enough for us to cut classes, panic, and call home to say goodbye to Mom and Dad?

My memories go back to last year when we invaded Grenada. I was walking to my 9:15 class and saw this man on a pedestal in front of the S.U.B. chanting "U.S. Out!" Did this man know what he was talking about? Did he know that Russian activity was ensuing in Grenada? Did he know that an airlift runway was being built that happened to be long enough to suit MIGs? No, this man did not know that, nor did he know that we had hundreds of medical students in Grenada. I, of course, did not know these things at that point either. But I did not assume. I also did not assume when I heard we "nuked a Russian aircraft carrier." I did not cry or go eat my last banana split. I waited to see. I waited with faith in the country I love and whom I support 100 percent in foreign affairs.

Today I walked out of the S.U.B. and saw a man making a big poster, "HANDS OFF NICARAGUA," so I confronted him. I asked, "Why don't you go make one of those in Russia also?"

He blankly said, "I don't live in Russia."

Good answer. I fail to understand not tolerating any type of U.S. intervention by people who don't even have open eyes to the reality of communist aggression. I don't like the thought of communist aggression either, but it's reality. If people don't see the world for what it is, and what the U.S. does for world democracy, then they should keep their thoughts to themselves.

Let's call for cooperation

We did it to ourselves. Ronald Reagan has won a second term and conservatism is becoming the wave of the future because we, the left, have torn our own movement limb from limb.

Liberals in this country are under as much attack from radicals as they are from conservatives. When Blacks will not turn out to support a woman candidate who is not black, or when feminists, in the midst of their enthusiasm over Ferraro, regard Mondale with nothing but contempt for being a man and a moderate, what can one expect?

The right wing reigns triumphant because it is made up of people who respect one another and can work together. There was a time when that was true of the left.

I call for an end to separatism. I call for cooperation between radicals and liberals, between revolutionaries and reformists. The enemy is not men, the enemy is not whites; the enemy is a resurgence of reactionary neoconservatives that will take this country by default if we continue to fight only amongst ourselves.

Ethics before presumptions

The protest Friday on the steps of the Student Union, organized by the Western Massachusetts Latin American Solidarity Committee and the Radical Student Union, was based on a rumor that the U.S. had bombed an arms-laden Soviet ship. The caption accompanying the photo on page three of Friday's Collegian (the photo was of a sign stating that the U.S. had bombed the ship) stated that the sign "was inaccurate — at least premature." Both of these are examples of the ridiculous presumptions made by some of the more leftist organizations on this campus.

We ask that the Solidarity Committee, the R.S.U. and the Collegian make an effort to have less of a predisposition against the U.S. and make an effort to be more responsible in what they protest or publish.

Hunger committee to talk on issues

By YADIRA BETANCES
Collegian Staff

A forum and press conference will be held Wednesday at 10 a.m. in the Campus Center of the University of Massachusetts to bring educational awareness of hunger, drought, famine and to discuss issues of nutrition and agricultural technology.

The Hunger Awareness committee, a University-based group formed by the urgency raised by the Ethiopian crisis, will attempt to educate the University at-large on these issues through films, speakers, lectures and sumposiums, said Sherwood Thompson, director of the Office of Third World Affairs.

The Committee will also hold a fund-raising drive for collecting monies to make contributions towards hunger relief.

One quarter of a billion people in Africa are threatened by starvation due to drought and famine.

All immigrants confront same problems

By YADIRA A. BETANCES
Collegian Staff

Caribbean people who migrate to the United States for economic betterment and political freedom usually suffer the same indignities and oppressions as other Third World immigrants, according to panelists speaking Saturday at the University of Massachusetts on the conflicts and prejudice of Caribbean immigrants.

English-speaking Caribbean immigrants seem to do better than their Spanish-speaking counterparts because of selectivity process for exodus and a "historical fear of losing face" once they return to the island, said John Walter, professor of Afro-American Studies at Smith College.

Walter said that being educated, having manners as well as owning property is "drilled into you like a religion."

Because of their higher degree of education, English-speaking Caribbean people are regarded as arrogant by Black Americans, he said. There is also hostility between the two groups because some immigrants, like Marcus Garvey and Stokely Carmichael, tend to dominate the political scene.

English-speaking immigrants are also more fierce than Black Americans in responding to the oppressions they face, Walter said. He added they are the ones who tend to intergrate all-White areas.

People from Jamaica and the Virgin Islands were "persuaded or seduced to come here" after the depression of 1883 by the prospect of success in the growing industrialism of the U.S. Many of these newcomers had socialist ideals, said Walters, then moved over to the communist party.

Their political thinking invoked a literacy test requirement in 1917 which cut down the number of immigrants, Walter said. After World War II, however, restrictions were eased because a labor force was needed.

Dominican immigration was "very small" during the dictatorship of Rafael Trujillo from 1930-1960, said Modesto Maldonado, technical coordinator at Greater Lawrence Vocational Technical High School in North Andover, Mass.

People migrating during Trujillo's 30 year reign were either affluent or had connections within the Dominican government, "as to not put the country down," Maldonado said.

"Doors opened up" after Trujillo assassination in 1961. People then saved money "to get a hold of a pot of gold" in the U.S., he said.

During the Civil War of 1965 Dominicans flee from political persecution settling in New York. In the late 60s to early 70s, the number of Dominicans increased tremendously because they were able to migrate easier than before.

"The New England states seem to be the type of challenge for Dominicans as going West for early Americans," Maldonado said.

Dominicans tend to ignore the discrimination they confront in housing, education and employment because they entertain the idea of returning home once they become economically stable, he said.

"That hinders the dream of intergrating in the American society," Maldonado said.

But Maldonado added that in the latter part of the 70s and the 80s, "Dominicans have become very stable," especially second generation Dominicans.

"They are becoming more acoustomed to a new culture making a greater impact in the socio-economic life of the U.S.," he said.

"Dominicans are definitely going to become a strong component in the American society," Maldonado said. But contrary to European immigrants their cultural background will never dissappear because of the strong ties with the homeland, he said.

Elton's remarkable final tour

Elton John
At the Worcester Centrum
Monday, November 5

By PHIL SERAFINO
Collegian Staff

If it is true that a good concert review should be an objective evaluation of a performance, then this is a pretty poor concert review. I went into Worcester Centrum as a diehard Elton John fan, fully convinced that I was going to see a superb show. I was not disappointed.

The British pianist demonstrated that after fifteen years of hits, he is still a master of the finely-crafted pop song with few equals. The only performers that come to mind able to equal Elton for longevity and quality are Paul McCartney and Stevie Wonder.

Opening with soulful renditions of "Tiny Dancer" and "Levon" from his 1971 Madman Across the Water LP, Elton and his band charged through a 23-song set that left few listeners dissatisfied. All the hits were there, as well as a few obscure gems like "Candle in the Wind," guaranteed to please fanatics like me.

Ballads are a trademark for Elton John, and Monday's show was full of his best, including "Rocket Man," "Daniel," "Sorry Seems to be the Hardest Word," and "Don't Let the Sun Go Down on Me." His four-member band provided exemplary backing vocals, especially the soaring harmonies on the latter two.

A new addition to the band, keyboardist-guitarist Fred Mandel, added synthesizers and rhythm guitar parts that gave the sound a full, rich texture that was lacking on Elton's last tour.

Always the consummate showman, Elton was dressed in blue tails, black pants, and a panama hat. While the histrionic excesses of his mid-1970's ceoncerts have been tamed somewhat, he still managed to kick over a few piano stools, and smash one on the stage.

"Bennie and the Jets", from 1973's Goodbye Yellow Brick Road allowed him to show off his considerable piano prowess, as the band left the stage while he took an extended solo that incorporated snatches of Glenn Miller's big band classic "In the Mood."

The rest of the band stretched out on "The Bitch Is Back" and "Saturday Night (is Alright for Fighting)", as Mandel and lead guitarist Davey Johnstone traded licks while Elton exhorted the cheering, stomping audience from the front of the stage.

The show also included John's latest singles, "Sad Songs" and "Restless," from his recently-released Breaking Hearts LP. I was horrified to learn that Elton had bastardized "Sad Songs" by making it into a commercial for Sasson on MTV. After Monday's concert, however, I have decided that Elton is forgiven: despite the trappings of commerciality, when it comes down to getting on stage and giving a show, he is still one of the most honest performers in the music business. Let us hope that he will change his mind about this being his last tour.

The always well-dressed Elton John presented a memorable concert at the Worcester Centrum last week.

"We were trying to play a strong defensive game," Harvard coach Bob Scalise said. "We wanted to maintain the defensive pressure and try to break something loose."

The offensive chances were few and far between for the 14-3-1 Crimson, the UMass offense, for the most part, controlled the ball.

The Minutemen, playing at home before a crowd of 500, had their persistence pay off with 11:30 left in the game as DePauw took a pass from a tripled-teamed Spence in the center of the box and fired it past Whitley's left side.

"Jolie took a nice shot," a disappointed Whitley said after the game. "I just didn't cover it." In two UMass-Harvard games this season Whitley has made 31 saves.

"It was a very aggressive and well-played game by both teams," the Crimson goalie said.

Banda credited his team's win to the defense his players showed, not giving Harvard a chance to get back into the game after the goal.

"We worked on defense all week. We play defense as a team and then everyone feels comfortable," Banda said. "It worked out pretty well."

So while a move to take advantage of the Harvard defense may not have been crucial, making Jolie DePauw and the rest of the UMass Minutemen feel comfortable was, and Harvard will be the ones watching the Final Four, not playing it.

Booters fall in season finale, 5-2

By ADAM NAZIMOWITZ
Collegian Staff

It has certainly been an improvement over last season, but the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team failed in their third straight attempt to tie the UMass soccer record of ten wins in a season, dropping a 5-2 decision to 12th ranked nationally, Hartwick.

"It was a real good game. We played pretty well. Hartwick's a great team. All things considered, the guys were real happy. They could walk off the field and feel real good about themselves," said UMass coach Jeff Gettler.

The Minutemen were still in the game, trailing only 2-1 at the half off of Kurt Manal's 11th goal of the year, assisted by Tom Giordano. The two teams played seesaw for a while as Hartwick went up 3-1, UM cut it to 3-2, but two good goals sealed the game for Hartwick.

Manal got his 30th point of the year as he assisted on co-captain Tom Uschok's fourth goal. The other co-captain Mike Runeare played well on defense in his, along with Back Mike Rudd's final game for the Minutemen (9-8-3).

"We had our chances during the year," said Gettler. "I'm pretty happy with the season. It's a nice turnaround from last year."

Minutemen drop sixth straight

• Delaware comes back to hand UMass tough loss, UNH next

By WAYNE SCHOFIELD
Collegian Correspondent

NEWARK, Del. — The University of Delaware scored two third quarter touchdowns to erase the University of Massachusetts' halftime lead and defeat the Minutemen 27-14 Saturday.

UMass, now 2-8, increased its losing streak to nine straight against the Blue Hens while its current seasonal losing streak stretched to six.

Next week, at home, the University of New Hampshire comes to McGuirk Alumni Stadium needing a victory to secure the Yankee Conference title and a berth to the Division I-AA playoffs. A UMass loss would mark the first time the Minutemen have lost nine games in a season since the 1893 campaign.

At Delaware Stadium before 13,367, UMass fell behind 10-0 early as junior place kicker John Gasson booted a 26 yard field goal and fullback Dan Reeder (a Penn State transfer) scored from the four with Gasson adding the point.

But UMass took a lead with a George Barnwell one yard plunge late in the first quarter with George Papoutsidis' kick and with another touchdown in the third period when fullback Frank Fay busted the longest run of his college career, a 42 yard scamper that gave UM a 14-10 advantage.

The run was the Minutemen's secnd longest rush of the season and gave Fay his fourth touchdown of the year. Delaware now 7-3, came right back as sophomore halfback Tony Tolbert came out of the wing T formation and gathered in a Rich Gannon pass for 28 yards and a touchdown to give the Hens a 17-14 lead.

Minutes later, Tolbert took Gannon's handoff and went 12 yards to make it 24-14. Gasson added a chip-shot field goal of 12 yards after a goaline stance by the Minutemen to close out the scoring.

• Flutie, BC climb in rankings, Lord Jeffs are perfect at 8-0

By the Associated Press —

Quarterback Doug Flutie and Boston College made a bid to regain ground in the national rankings and New Hampshire moved closer to a postseason playoff berth Saturday as the curtain began to lower on the 1984 New England college football season.

In other features, Boston University clinched a tie for the Yankee Conference title, Harvard's Ivy League bubble burst, Plymouth State wrapped up another New England Conference title with an unbeaten record and Amherst completed its first perfect campaign since 1964.

Flutie ,who set a national record for total yardage Nov. 3, became the NCAA's all-time passing leader as BC, 6-2, weathered Army's wishbone blitz for a 45-31 victory over the Cadets.

In his swan song at BC's Alumni Stadium, Flutie hit on 19 of 29 passes for 311 yards and three touchdowns. That boosted his career passing yardage to 9,695, bettering the record of 9,614 set by Ben Bennett of Duke.

New Hampshire, beaten only by Boston University early in the season, held on for a 14-13 victory over Holy Cross. Andre Garron ran 28 times for 128 yards and two touchdowns in leading the Wildcats to their ninth victory.

New Hampshire, 3-1 in the Yankee Conference, winds up its schedule with a league game at Massachusetts this week. The Wildcats will be heavily favored as they bid for an NCAA Division 1-AA playoff invitation.

Boston University, 8-2 overall, clinched a tie for the Yankee Conference title and kept alive playoffs hopes with a 21-17 victory over Connecticut.

That gave the Terriers a 4-1 league record. New Hampshire and Rhode Island, which plays Connecticut this week, are tied at 3-1.

Harvard suffered its first Ivy League loss and fell one game behind Penn in the championship race in a 38-7 trouncing by the Quakers in Philadelphia. The Crimson are host to Yale in a traditional windup this week, while Penn, unbeaten in the league, takes on weak Cornell.

Yale tuned up for a showdown with Harvard by edging Princeton 27-24 in what Coach Carmen Cozza called "the most spectacular comeback in the 20 years I've been here." The Elis drove 98 yards in 12 plays for the winning touchdown, Mike Curtin passing 14 yards to Keven Moriarty for the score with nine seconds remaining.

Dartmouth, which lost its first six games, made it two victories in a row, beating Brown 25-11 as Lorenzo Chambers carried 29 times for 135 yards and one touchdown.

Joe Dudek ran for 201 yards and three touchdowns as Plymouth State finished 10-0 overall and 9-0 in the New England Conference with a 43-14 romp over Curry. Western Connecticut finished second in the league with an 8-1 record by routing Nichols 48-0. Curry was third with a 7-2 mark.

Amherst quarterback Jeff Templeton ran for two touchdowns and the Lord Jeffs completed an 8-0 season by winning the Little Three championship with a 23-6 victory over Williams. It was the 100th meeting in an old rivalry.

Main hit the road for a non-league game and pulled out a 27-23 victory over Howard on forth period touchdowns by Todd McAniff and Bob Wilder. Massachusetts was beaten 27-14 by Delaware in another non-conference engagement.

Harvard wasn't helped by the loss of team captain Jennifer Greenly, who broke her hand with 26:49 to go in the game. "That hurt us," Scalise said. "We didn't have the continuity in the middle."

The Crimson went for broke with 7:30 to go in the game, using Whitley as a sweeper back for the rest of the game. But that didn't work, as UMass continued to control the ball.

"It was a case of both teams being tired," Scalise said of the only goal the Crimson surrendered. "Whoever made a miscue in the penalty area first would be scored on . It was a well-placed shot."

The win was UMass' first over Harvard since 1983 and it left UMass undefeated in NCAA play at Boyden. They are 4-0 since 1982 at home.

"I didn't think it would be easy," DePauw said of the win. "It was just a total team effort. The whole team gave everything they had."

"This is a very offensive-minded team," Banda said. "It's hard for them to think defense. But they did!"

The Minutemen will now turn their attention to the University of Connecticut Huskies, upset winners over Brown, the topseeded team in the tournament, Saturday night.

The Huskies earned their fourth consecutive trip to the Final Four on Huskie forward Cathy Shankweiler's goal with 24:34 into the game. UConn goalie Laura Skaza and the Huskie defense withstood some heavy pressure. Brown outshot UConn, 13-5.

UMass cruises into Final Four, 1-0

Harvard falls as defense pays off

By GERRY deSIMAS
Collegian Staff

Last year, University of Massachusetts women's soccer coach Kalekeni Banda took a Minuteman team that lived and died by its defense to a third place finish in the Final Four.

This year's offensive-minded machine (56 goals in 18 games) took a heavy dose of defense and it helped the Minutemen advance to their second consecutive Final Four with a 1-0 win over Harvard University in the NCAA quarter-finals, Saturday at Boyden Field.

"The difference was defense," UMass midfielder Jamie Watson said. "Everyone can play defense and it makes us feel part of a unit. It builds confidence."

The 14-2-2 Minutemen face arch-rival Connecticut, a 1-0 upset victor over top-seeded Brown, Saturday in the national semi-finals at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

Three time defending national champion North Carolina will face the University of California-Berkely in the other semi-final matchup.

The Minutemen outshot Harvard, which eliminated Vermont 2-1 to reach the quarter-final round, by an impressive 17-2 margin.

But the stingy Crimson defense, led by fullback Lori Barry and freshman Tracee Whitley in goal, kept the Minutemen at bay until UMass freshman forward Jolie DePauw took a Cathy Spence pass and sent a shot by Whitley with 11:30 to go in the game.

DePauw's goal, set up by a crossing pass from Watson to Spence, was her 14th of the year and it brought the estimated crowd of 500 alive and to its feet and broke the tension for UMass, who proceeded to go on an offensive tear.

"We tried to play a very strong defensive game," Harvard coach Bob Scalise said. "We tried to deny them shots from inside the penalty area. We have an unbelievable goalie and I didn't think they would score on 30 yard shots."

As in Harvard's 1-0 win over UMass in October, the Crimson packed in the middle of the field and although UMass held the ball in the visitor's end, they had a hard time breaching the defense and Whitley.

But it was the UMass defensive play that limited the Crimson offensive opportunities and gave the Minutemen the chances to score.

"We practiced defense all week," UMass midfielder Carolyn Micheel said, and the team was prepared. "We were ready to counter-attack."

"We played a lot better than we did last time (vs. Harvard)," freshman back Chris Schmitt said. "We didn't give up a goal in the first half and weren't in a panic." Schmitt has a stellar game in the back and Micheel played well in the middle with Watson.

"We played defense as a team," Banda said. "If one girl gets burned, someone else is there to pick it up so she isn't useless for 90 minutes. Lori (Stukes) is a senior back there and that really helps." Stukes, an All-American choice last year, anchors the defense at sweeper.

Senior Co-Captain and sweeper back Lori Stykes (15) leads the victory charge as Minutemen back Susan Bird (2) and midfielder Jamie Watson (8) give each other high fives, while freshman midfielder Carolyn Michael (7) trails the pack. They are seen celebrating teammate Jolie DePauw's goal, the only one of the game, which gave UMass a 1-0 victory over Harvard and earned them a trip to North Carolina for next week's final four match-up against rival UConn.

DePauw moves, goal!

By GERRY deSIMAS
Collegian Staff

Both coaches in Saturday's NCAA women's soccer quarter-final matchup between the fourth-seeded University of Massachusetts and Harvard University agreed that the move of UMass' Jolie DePauw from left to right wing with about 18 minutes to go in the game was not a crucial one.

Even DePauw, a freshman from Arlington, Virginia and UM's top scorer (13 goals and five assists for 31 points) thought it was no big deal saying, "I guess it was a good move."

It was, however, the right move for the MInutemen who used DePauw's eighth game-winning tally of the season to topple the Crimson 1-0 and earn a berth in their second consecutive Final Four.

UMass had coach Kalenkeni Banda said the switch with freshman Cathy Spence made DePauw more relaxed.

"It made Jolie feel more comfortable so she could take that girl (Harvard goalie Tracee Whitley) head on," Banda said.

DePauw had been contained by the outstanding defensive work of right back Lori Barry, also a freshman. The UMass offense as a whole had been kept in check by an aggressive Harvard defense, the same defense that shut UMass out 1-0 earlier in the season.

The 14-2-2 Minutemen held a 17-2 shot advantage but the Crimson were stubborn deep in their end with a frequently packed-in defense and another stellar game by Whitley, a freshman goalie who recorded 16 saves.

Stickers fail on penalty strokes, fall to U Conn

4-3 loss drops UM out of NCAA playoffs

By ED HAYWARD
Collegian Staff

STORRS Conn.—The University of Connecticut field hockey team eliminated the University of Massachusetts from the NCAA playoffs 4-3 Saturday with victory coming on a Pam Larney penalty stroke in a shoot off held after three overtime periods, during which neither team succeeded in breaking the 3-3 tie regulation play ended in.

After 100 minutes (70 in regulation, and three OT periods of ten minutes) of play that clearly displayed the strengths that put the two teams into the playoffs, the game's decision rested on "strokes".

In the tie-breaker each team is allowed five shots, the teams alternating attempts. Each team chooses five individual players to shot.

In the first series, UMass sent sophomosre forward Erin Canniff up against UConn's senior All-American keeper Terry Kix. With the small crowd drawn along the sidelines and onto the field, Canniff put the ball in the upper right corner of the net for a 1-0 UMass advantage. However, UConn's career points leader, forward Rose Smith quickly evened the score against UMass goalie, freshman Lynn Carlson.

In the third series All-American midfielder Megan Donnelly evened the score for the Minutemen as her shot deflected off the right arm of a diving Kix. But UConn's career goal leader Wendy Hug put her team back on top 3-2.

UMass' other co-captain Andrea Mucceni's attempt was blocked by Kix. With UConn able to take an insurmountable 4-2 lead on their next score, Larney was sent to shoot. Her attempt was to the lower left corner of the goal, Carlson made a strong effort but the ball still rolled in for the game winner after striking the keeper's stick. There was no need for the fifth series.

"It was unfortunate that either team had to lose in the penalty stroke situation," said UConn coach Diane Wright. "You would have liked to have seen the teams keep playing up and down the field until somebody scored.

Midway through the first half UMass began to dominate play but UConn turned things around as Smith scored with ten minutes remaining. With five minutes remaining Maura Coughlin took a Mucceni pass to tie the score.

The score put momentum on UMass' side and the team began to pressure the Huskie defense consistently.

Donnelly took a Moryl feed with three and a half minutes remaining and put UMass up 2-1. UConn made a strong last minute drive but Carlson stopped six successive Huskie shots to preserve the lead.

UConn came out strong in the second half with Fuchs scoring her first goal of the day after only four minutes of play. Then the game turned into a see-saw battle with UMass midfielders Donnelly and Moryl leading Minutemen attacks and stopping most Huskie efforts before they did any damage.

About midway through the half Fuchs scored again to put UConn up 3-2. Five minutes later Donnelly scored the tying goal for the Minutemen.

The remainder of regulation and overtime play saw both teams taking control momentarily but most drives ended with strong opposition and fine stops from the keepers Carlson and Kix. Both players succeeded in keeping their teams in the game and the score tied.

"It was a real good contest," said UMass coach Pam Hixon. "Both teams had their chances and I think the keepers played big roles for each team throughout the game. Lynn is a freshman and she did a good job for us today. Terry Kix is a senior and an All-American, she's very, very strong."

"I thought everyone played well for us today," Hixon said. "We played well as a unit. we passed the ball well and our midfielders moved the ball well. We had our chances, but we just couldn't capitalize."

APATHY : Root Cause of Ineffectiveness

Editor's Note: In recent years the central issue surrounding Third World Organizations has been student involvement. Student apathy and lack of participation have often been the root causes of ineffectiveness among Third World groups. All too often a small core of dedicated students have taken on the reponsibility of running these organizations while the majority of the student population, either directly or indirectly, reeps the benefits.

A prime example of this was the Third World Student Leadership conference held at UMass on October 27. This was the second year UMass hosted the conference, specifically designed for student involvement, and the second time that visiting students outnumbered UMass students. In light of this situation, NUMMO NEWS interviewed a number of students and administrators, who were present at the conference, to get their opinions on the cause of the problem and the potential solutions. The following are excerpts from those interviews:

JOHN RUDDOCK, CO-EXTERNAL COORDINATOR, THIRD WORLD CAUCUS:

"I feel that the (Third World Leadership) conference brings students together around the issue of leadership. People are given intense exposure to administrators, leaders and other directly involved in post-college fields. It is a unique opportunity for students to learn and share experiences from the Third World, experiences in the University and life in general."

"Students, in apathy or lack of support of Third World organizations, are neglecting the experience of acquiring practical knowledge in fields that they plan to enter. Students must realize that over $100 thousand of their Student Activities Fee is used to support and provide co-curricular activities for this exact purpose. If organizations are not used to learn more, they (students) will cheat themselves of all the resources the University has to offer."

"Leaders have a mandated reponsibility to recruit and organize new students into organizations. If for no other reason to lay down a foundation to protect Third World resources which others made available to them. While it is very important for Third World students to expand and enlargen our sphere of influence at the University, it is more important for us to maintain the power base which we presently have. We have not yet gone over the mountain but we cannot afford to slid into the abiss."

CHRISTOPHER WILLIAMS, JUNIOR TRANSFER STUDENT FROM QUEENS COLLEGE:

"I am gravely dissappointed in the turn-out (of the conference). What has shown is a reflection not just of black students at the Unversity but black people in general. It seems they (blacks) will celebrate or participate in anything, as long as it has nothing to do with being black."

"Everyone is here to study but a lot of peoople would have been here for other functions. A lot of GROUPS weren't even here. When there is a party at the New Africa House or Smith (College) everybody knows and everybody goes. It's a shame that people struggled for things like this (organizations and events) to exist and what I see happening is that it is heading toward extinction. Twenty years after the Civil Rights Act and things are getting worse."

"Black people are too comfortable today. When oppression gets worse it brings the most out of people. The cushion (that blacks rest upon) will fall apart."

RUDOLPH JONES, ASSISTANT DIRECTOR OF ADMISSIONS:

"We are now in a post-activist environment. Prior to the 1970's, there were burning issues and interests that students could be modivated to get involved in, such as Civil Right and the war in Vietnam. This new "me" generation and environment speaks to lesser issues. Black students should never be caught in complacent attitudes where they believe that they are equal. They have a responsibility to perpetuate the struggle."

"I am appalled at the level of participation in Black organizations. Particularly Black males, who are allowing females to carry the weight of leadership and responsibility."

PAUL BARROWS, DIRECTOR OF CCEBMS:

"I am deeply troubled about the lack of presence and participation of students. However, the Office of Third World Affairs and the few core students who do the leg-work should be commended for their outstanding work. We must not dwell on the negative. We have established where we are and the work that is ahead of us. If the social consciousness of students is low it means we must work that much harder and make them aware of how they can participate in a focused way."

"The enthusiasm of students in the freshman and sophmore classes does not match the level of involvement that I had anticipated. I am not sure, however, that the lack of attendance is due, exclusively, to lack of interest. All of the Third World staff and students have a moral responsibility to provide leadership to incoming students so they can become aware and active in issues at the University."

"More outreach with students is needed. More student organizations need staff members to work with them in an advisory roll. Staff can provide continuity and leadership. Other incentives, such as credit and financial arrangements can be used. If we get the message to students, involvement will go up."

Ethiopia' s Devestating Famine Stirs Old Issues

by Rod Clare

On October 30, NBC broadcast a five minute report on the massive famine in Ethiopia. The film captured in horrific detail the plight of starving millions and explained that a number of factors contributed to the severity and scope of the problem:

1.) inadequate rainfall,, which over the past 15 years has made the oil infertile;
2.) neglect of village level development projects;
3.) a sharp increase in world oil prices;
4.) severe world recession stalling investment in;
5.) wars and civil strife hampering cultivation and harvests.

In Ethiopia you will find the worst suffering in Tigre, Gondar, and Wollo provinces and in the disputed territories of Eritrea. In all of these areas, national movements are fighting to throw off rule by the central government in Addis Ababa ore stablish a degree of local autonomy. An estimated 200,000 Ethiopians died in the country's last great famine a decade ago and relief officials estimate that well over a million might die now.

Getting the food to Ethiopia's hungry is no easy matter. The country's antiquated ports permit the delivery of no more than 50,000 tons of food a month. Only about 1 in 7 drought victims is easily accessible, many live in mountain villages that cannot be reached even by four-wheel-drive vehicles. As many as one third of the relief commission's 200 trucks are crippled by lack of spare parts, and until recently the Ethiopian Army was reluctant to lend any of its own vehicles to the rescue effort.

Some relief officials charged that Western governments had deliberately dragged their feet because of their opposition to Ethiopia's socialist government. The U.S., however, has been the largest single donor to Ethiopia, pledging over 100,000 metric tons of grain this year. Actually, the government itself to even acknowledge the crisis until after the September celebrations marking the 10th anniversary of its seizure of power - a celebration that cost up to $250 million.

Happenings in the Valley

by Marilyn G. Bou

The Five College Faculty Concert took place November 8 and 9 at Mount Holyoke College and also at Amherst College on the 10th and 11th of November.

The dance concert series included choreographers from the five colleges and Dr. Pearl Primus, a five-college professor of dance and a reknowed black dancer and choreographer.

The concert which highlighted "Excerpts from an African Journey," for the most part was a disappointment. The overall production was average with a few capturing acts. The act entitled, "Ground," in which the dancer performed the part of a person yearning to fly, twisted his body into figures one only expects a pretzel to do.

Two performers acted out a scene in which they were having a romantic dinner while trying to kill one another, this was done in such a way that laughter was inevitable.

"Chants" where two songs, native of Africa, were performed. This seemedd to be enjoyed by the audience. "War Dance," lifted the mood within the concert hall. "Drum talk" featured two men on congas, drums native to Africa and the Carribean, had the audience swaying to the beat. "Hi-Life," a social dance which originated in Ghana and now danced throughout the West and Central Africa, was the overall highlight of the entire production. The deep drum music and dancers enchanted the audience.

Dr. Primus should be complimented on her contribution to this production. The tradition of African dance and culture was portrayed as beautifully as could be expected from people who are not native to the continent. The dancers along with all the behind the scences participants, I am sure, put forth countless hours towards the production and should be given a round of applause.

The disappointment of "Excerpts" was the imbalance of Black people in a production which catered to Africa. It seems that perhaps there are not enough people in the Valley that care about their African heritage. Enough of us are ready to displace someone who is not Black, but it seems they are more eager to learn about our heritage than we are. Many of us are to "busy" to care, being "cool" and worried about learning the newest dance step to stop and wonder where it came from.

Dr. Primus is known throughout the world and has knowledge of her roots. This was a wonderful growing and learning experience which many of us passed up.

The Caribbean Cultural Events which took place at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst from November 7 through the 10th, reinforced for many, the continuous struggles of our people, but also the pride which we hold in our hearts for those Islands. The events ranged from films, poems and music to art.

Guest poet Jose Ramon "Che" Melendez, from Puerto Rico, read his poetry to an attentive audience whose blood warmed an cooled with his words. A film entitled "The Two Worlds of Angelita" encompassed one person's struggle of leaving her native island and confronting the cultural and geographical changes of New York City. "Brigada Venceremos" celebrated it's fifteenth anniversary on November 9 with a talk on the longest history of any educational project in solidarity with the Cuban Revolution. For 15 years the Brigade has sent 15 contigents--over 5,000 people--to Cuba. The participants enjoyed the performance of " Sorobey", a folkloric dance group composed of children from the Valley. Irma McClaurin Allen delighted the audience with her poetry.

A panel discussion held on November 10th discussed the struggles Carribbean peoples encounter when they come to America. Language is the most basic problem of the barrier, for it emcompasses everything else. A dance which featured "Massai", a Reggae band form Rhode Island along with "Junentud 77", a Latin band from Springfield, rapped up the week's events.

This past Saturday, the second concert of the innovations: Traditions In Change Jazz Series took place at the new Center for the Arts in Northampton with a performance by Clyde Criner and Omar Hakim with special guest Tim Moran and Tony Vacca. The concert was a collection of some very new and innovative jazz music by today's young-and-upcoming artist.

The program started with Tim Moran and Tony Vacca. Both are local musicians of the Pioneer Valley. Vacca showed great skill on various African percussion instruments with Moran accompanied on sax and flute. Both are members of the local group Winds of Change that will end the series in two weeks.

Clyde Criner has also lived in the area in the past and is now residing in New York where he is playing keyboard with some of today's jazz greats. Omar Hakim who has some of the same credentials is most noted as being the drummer for the group Weather Report. The two used a combination of recorded, electronic, and percussion music to come up with an innovative sound. Yet the concert was flawed at times because the show started a half hour late. After Moran and Vacca finished there was a long intermission and then Criner and Hakim took too much time between songs. This lead to a show over at midnite. The program was entertaining but much of the crowd left before the show had ended.

WESTERN CONFERENCE PACIFIC DIVISION

The Los Angeles Lakers have captivated the Pacific Division title and been in the NBA Finals four of the past five years. However, this year there may be a little more competition. Portland is tough and has that look of a championship contender with the acquisition of Kiki Vandeweghe and Sam Bowie. Phoenix features the Greyhound, Walter Davis, and the Ayatollah of Slamola, Larry Nance. Yet unless free agent Maurice Lucas (McMean) is signed, there may be problems in the land of the rising "Suns." The L.A. Clipper have improved themselves with the acquisitions of Lancaster Gordon, Harvey Catchings, Junior Bridgeman, and superstar, Marques Johnson. Seattle is attempting to find out if there is life after Gus (Williams) and Golden State is entering the Patrick Ewing sweepstakes.

Los Angeles Lakers-

The Lakers are, as usual, loaded, they have superstars Kareem Abdull Jabbar, and Magic Johnson. They have supporting stars, James Worthy, Jamaal Wilkes, Bob McAdoo, Michael Cooper, and a budding superstar in Byron Scott. Solid role players Mike McGee and Kurt Rambis will play key roles.

Rebounding is the Laker's weakness and the reason why they are not the current NBA champions. Maybe first round draft pick Earl Jones of U.D.C. is the answer, maybe not. Unless the Lakers get more rebounds from their other front court players the road to the championship will be filled with road blocks.

Portland Trail Blazers-

Portland has that look of an up-and-coming contender with Sam Bowie, Mychal Thompson, Kiki Vandewghe, Jim Paxson, and Darnell Valentine as the starters. With Audie Norris, Kenny Carr, and Clyde Drexler, Portland has depth. With the acquisition of rookie Sam Bowie, Wayne Cooper, Calvin Natt and Lafayette Lever have been traded. Portland does have question marks. Who will back up Valentine? Who will back up Paxson?

Phoenix Suns-

A team with a lot of question marks. Will they sign Maurice Lucas? Will James Edwards come through at center? How good is Jay Humphries? If Lucas signs Phoenix could be tough. With a front line featuring 6'10" Larry Nance, 7'1" James Edwards, and 6'9" Maurice Lucas, the Suns are big and quick. Quality front court depth is present with Alvan Adams, Alvin Scott, Charles Pittman and (please don't laugh) Rick Robey. However, Lucas is the key player in the front court. He contribute rebounding, leadership, and intimidation.

The Phoenix back court situation is unsettled. In Walter Davis (Sweet D.) they have an all-star guard. The question is who will play with him. Jay Humphries may be the answer. Some scouts compare him to Dennis Johnson because of his height (6'3"), defensive skills and leaping ability. Some compare him to Norm Nixon because of his quickness, ball handling and outsidee shot. While some compare him to Ernie Grunfeld, a college star who has never been more than a spot role player in the pros. If Lucas signs and Humpries is a combination of D.J. and Norm Nixon, Phoenix could be tough.

A team on the move. In the past six months, they have acquired Lancaster Gordon, Junior Bridgeman, Harvey Catchings, and Marques Johnson. If these new players blend with Norm Nixon, Derek Smith, Bill Walton, and James Donaldson, the Clippers could surprise some people. However, with Terry Cummings gone who will play power forward? With Donaldson and Walton in the lineup, the Clippers are much too slow defensively. The rest of the lineup appears solid with Nixon and Johnson set as starters, Junior Bridgeman adding scoring and expeirence off the bench and Gordon and Smith (the Louisville connection) providing a youthful base to build upon.

Seattle Supersonics-

The Supersonics have problems. The Sonics who won an NBA title as recently as 1979 and played in the conference finals in 1980, have been victimized by bad trades and poor drafting. Look at the record. Summer of 1980, Sonics trade Dennis Johnson for Puall Westphal. Sonics refuse to sign Gus Williams for the money he requested, Williams sits out a year. Result: Westphal was injured part of a year, started declining and is nearly washed up. A weak back court without Gus and Seattle falls to 34-48 on the year.

Draft of 80-81, Seattle covets Al Wood as a scoring forward. However, Wood is picked fourth so Seattle picking fifth chooses Denny Uranes ahead of front court players Larry Nance, Tom Chambers, (whom they eventually acquired), Jay Vincent, Gene Banks, Eddie Honson, Lewis Lloyd, Kelly Tripucka, Orlando Woolridge, Herb Williams, and Albert King. Seattle, which also needed guard help, by-passed Mike McGee, Frank Johnson, and Rolando Blackman. Needless to say, Seattle would love to have some of the players previously mentioned. The draft and trade have not worked out well for Seattle and the team has a lot of rebuilding to do before they could be considered contenders.

Here is the predicted order of finish:

1.) L.A. Lakers
2.) Portland Trail Blazers
3.) Phoenix Suns
4.) L.A. Clippers
5.) Seattle Supersonics
6.) Golden State Warriors

A Perspective of the State of Black America

by Christopher Williams

With this year's presidential campaign by the Rev. Jesse Jackson and with over 200 African-Americans as elected officials throughout the U.S., some African-Americans have begun to form the opinion that they are now better off than they have been in the past. However, this opinion is not shared by one African-American--Michael McCann--who is a student at Hampshire College in Amherst, Massachusetts. "A selected few blacks have made progress, but I think you'll find that a few go up and a lot more come down," said McCann.

McCann said he believes that the individual achievements accomplished by certain black people like a black astronaut or even a black Miss America are good within themselves, but they cannot solve the problems that blacks have as a race. "A recent figure released by the government showed that white's take-home pay had increased by $500, under the Reagan Administration, while that of blacks has decreased by $2,500", said McCann.

When asked about the presidential election McCann stated that it had no relevance to black people whatsoever, democrats and the republicans are one in the same. "Both parties are heading in the same direction, one slighlty slower than the other, but with the same goal in mind," said McCann.

McCann said he believes that this goal is to maintain the existing American economic and political system, and make any necessary improvements upon it. Furthermore, he added, "that this is not a partisan goal, but one that both parties zealously pursue. McCann, also convinced that the system possesses innate contradictions that help to produce disasters like famines and scarce employment opportunities, especially for black youth, "...no one seems to care, no one is doing anything about it," stated McCann.

According to McCann, blacks are not free while they are the constant victims of starvation and exceedingly high unemployment. Citing an analogy by Malcolm X, McCann then said, if a prisoner who is placed in solitary confinement was then suddenly allowed to roam the prison at his own discretion, would that constitute freedom?

McCann believes that blacks will be truely liberated when they accept the fact that they are sometimes their own worst enemies. He also added that Black people should socially ostracize uncle-toms who misrepresent black people, and replace them with such leaders like the Minister Louis Farrakahn, the national spokesman for the Nation of Islam, a black muslim group. "We should also realize that we as black people are diametrically opposed not just to white people, but to any non-black people," said McCann.

When he was asked whether or not this last statement was racist, McCann replied by saying, "I consider it racist in the sense that I have an unbridled love for my people. I hold no true hatred for other races, but I feel that at this stage in history it is too early for universal love."

Since McCann said that blacks do not have much of a future with the republican or even the democratic party, he believes that blacks will have to become self-reliant. "So, I feel that blacks in America will have to sacrifice like never before to travel, learn and live with blacks in other countries to try and solve the very real threat of extinction," McCann concluded.

Asian American Students Association

What We Are

The Asian-American Students Association (AASA) is a recognized student organization founded in 1974 by students who wished to amplify their education and learn more about themselves as Asian-Americans. Now, ten years later, our organization has grown in awareness as well as in number. In order to continue this growth, we need your support. The ultimate goals of AASA are, as stated in the recently revised constitution:

To promote the views and voice of Asian-American students.

To provide Asian-American students with a foundation, be it social, educational, and/or political, with which they may relate.

To pursue incorporation of Asian-American culture, customs, and folkways into contemporary society.

Enroute to achieving these goals, AASA sponsors many activities which in some way enrich our sense of being and belonging.

Who We Are

Our organization is composed of members of various national origins; They include Chinese, Korean, Japanese, Phillipino, Indian, Cambodian, and still others. Our officers and members (100+ expected this year) are unique individuals who want something more out of this University and are therefore dedicated to excellence.

THE DISILLUSION

Many students, Asian-Americans in particular, embarassed to join our organization because of a clinging myth that an assembly of any culturally-based organization carries a bias towards their own culture. These students, thinking that joining a club such as AASA would "cramp their style", shy away from alleged obsolencence.

If they were right, then what about all the current members of AASA? Are we all so naive that we are ignorant of how society runs or how we may be accepted into society? Those who disapprove of our organization are employers of stereotypes, guessing without actually trying to find out what AASA is about.

Asian-Americans are members of AASA because they hold pride in their heritage and because they want to be involved in social programs which they can relate to. Non-Asian students join mainly for the recreational activities and for the social context of the organization. All members, regardless of why they joined, will grow in cultural and social awareness.

Asian-American students may be sub-divided into numerous catagories. The two general ones are: 1. those born or raised at an early age in the United States, and 2. those who are recent immigrants. Those Asian-Americans who have adapted to the American way of life naturally go on with their daily activities with little or no problems. Those who have recently immigrated are the ones who would benefit most from our organization. This is because they are in a new and very different environment. It takes time to get used to a new environment and to become fluent in a new language. AASA can shorten this period of adaption by holding meeting and other gatherings where students can familiarize themselves. In addition, many Asian-American upperclasspersons voluteer their time as peer advisors. The Asian-American Peer Advising program was founded a year ago to help those students who are struggling in social and/or academic areas. This program was started because students tend to be more comfortable confiding in peers rather than going through a more formal format with professionals.

The Asian-American Student Assoication encourages and invites all students to attend our meetings and functions. AASA meetings are held at least every other Thursday in the campus center. Participation brings success. AASA is only as much as what our members put into the organization.

The New World Theater at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst presents "Life in the Fast Lane" on Saturday, November 17, at 8 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium. Written and performed by Japanese Hawaiian poet, Lane Nishikawa, "Life in the Fast Lane" is a dynamic play about growing up Asian-American. Critics have called it a "one-man tour de force". From the country twang of the good ol' boy in 'The Bigot', to the street rap of 'The Black Jap', to the pigdin English of 'They Was Close, Those Brothers', to a recollection of foods prepared by his Oba-Chan (grandmother), Nishikawa shares his experiences with the audience. Produced by Sansei Productions of San Francisco, "Life in the Fast Lane" returns to Amherst after a successful performance at the University in 1982.

In conjunction with the play, Nishikawa will present a lecture demonstration on Asian-American Theater at 2 p.m. on November 17 at Emlly Dickinson Hall, Hampshire College. The lecture is free and open to the public.

Tickets for the evening performance are available at the Fine Arts Center Box Office (545-2511) or at the door the night of the performance. Childcare can be provided by phoning 545-0190 one week prior.

AUGUSTA SAVAGE GALLERY EXHIBIT

On the 8th of November, 1984 "The Luis E. Guarnizo Exhibit" opened at the Augusta Savage Memorial Gallery. The exhibit includes Senor Guarnize's paintings and drawings.

The strength and dramatism of his work will move the viewer to see Columbian life, the pain and the anguish yet above this the colour and the beauty of the society. Senor Guarnizo is presenting us with volumes of feeling and colour which harmoniously protray man's universal quest for strength and peace.

His painting technique explodes with warm and strong "Alla Prima" colours expertly executed through the exclusive use of knives. This unique combination generates rich and deep textures.

The exhibit will run until November 21 and a reception will be held on November 16 from 2 until 5 p.m.

The Augusta Savage Memorial Gallery is open to the public and our regular hours are Monday thru Friday, 10 a.m. to 4 p.m.

JAZZ CONCERT SERIES

Starting Monday, November 12th at 9 p.m., Amherst musician Greg Chapopoulo will launch the first of six weekly jazz concerts to occur on Monday nights in the Tavern of the Lord Jeffery Inn. These concerts will feature the talents of Black artists from New York and New England. A different guest performer will be highlighted every week, some of whom are top name recording artists. Last spring, Greg Chapopoulo submitted three proposals to the Amherst Arts Council for review, and this concert mini-series is one which was late approved. The Lord Jeffery Inn has matched the Arts Council funds, and Valley residents can now enjoy these weekly Monday night performances through December until Christmas week. THE PURPOSE OF THE SERIES IS TO HIGHLIGHT AFRO-AMERICAN MUSICIANS AND THUS FOSTER A GREATER UNDERSTANDING, APPRECIATION, AND AVAILABILITY OF LIVE JAZZ MUSIC.

The Monday night shows in the tavern of the Jeff will begin at 9:30 p.m., EXCEPT the first one (9 p.m. above), and will consist of two shows. Future guest artists will be listed in local papers.

1000 extra course books sold at store

By LESLEY CLARK
Collegian Staff

Students, campus visitors, and anyone who wants this year's course catalog must pay $1.50 in the University Store to cover the cost of publishing the additional 1,000 copies.

According to Tim Rhinehart, assistant director of academic support services, the additional catalogs were printed because "it is essentially a service to the students and campus visitors who wanted a course catalog and were unable to get one."

The University Store will receive 30 cents profit for each copy sold. The catalogs in the past have been distributed throughout the campus free of charge every spring. Rhinehart said the additional copies are to serve as a supplement to the ones already distributed.

Rhinehart said it is not economical for the University to publish more free catalogs, and that the catalogs are being sold at a cost to defray the publishing expenses.

Rhinehart said that the University is not able to print unlimited copies, but selling the catalogs at cost replaces money to funds that were used to print the extra catalogs.

Winfred Cummings, manager of the University Store, said he was reluctant at first to sell the catalogs, but because they were being sold to cover printing costs, he agreed.

This is the first year that additional copies have been sold in the University Store, and Rhinehart said it has met with approval "from people who said they wished it had been done before."

Students reacting to the sale of catalogs said they questioned who would buy them.

"Why would anyone buy one?" Meg McAdam, a junior computer information science major from Everett said, " and why should they be selling something everyone needs? That's what we pay tution for."

Brenda Sullivan, a junior psychology major from Weymouth, said the sale of the catalogs is "tacky, they should be available free to anyone who wants one."

The Office of Publications produces 25,000 to 30,000 catalogs every spring, with 10,000 of these going to the Admissions Office for recruitment purposes. The remaining catalogs are distributed on campus.

To help increase employee morale, reduce stress and improve fitness, the Department of Public Safety is encouraging its police officers to participate in a two-phase aerobic conditioning program.

Marc Fifield, a UMass police officer, said that he participates in the program at least once a week.

"I've been participating in the program since it started. It helped me quit smoking and it's make a measurable improvement in my heart and lungs," Fifield said.

The conditioning program consists of two phases of cardiovascular activity. The first phase includes aerobic activity such as walking, jogging, bike riding and swimming.

Trustees reject constitution

Task force to resolve 'underlying disagreement'

By CHRIS POON
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts Board of Trustees have still not approved a constitution for the Undergraduate Student Senate, because they are waiting for the resolution of conflicts between the administration and the SGA.

A task force that has been formed to resolve the problems includes seven student representatives, and five university administrators, who are working on three underlying themes of disagreement, SGA co-president Jim Keller said.

"The control of student activities fees, control over University buildings funded by student money, and the students' bill of rights are the three major differences we have with the administration," Chris Sullivan, speaker of the undergraduate Student Senated, said.

Sullivan said the constitution gives a large amount of authority to the student government within the University structure. "Basically, the administration wants to limit our power," he said.

The constitution was passed by the senate last spring and forwarded to the Board of Trustees, after approval by the administration. UMass Chancellor Joeph P. Duffey asked the Board of Trustees to approve it subject to his recommendations," Keller said

"We came up with the constitution after making concessions to the administration, and the administration making concessions for us," Keller said. He said Duffey's recommendations have caused the Board of Trustees to reject the constitution.

The trustees will not pass the constitution until the on-campus conflict between the administration and students is resolved.

"The trustees want everything in total agreement," Sullivan said. "They are waiting to see how the positions will come together. They don't want to approve it until the Senate and administration come together," he said.

"The trustees want to make sure that there is an agreement in writing for us to abide by," Keller said. He said the trustees could legally force the senate to stop operations and freeze its funds without an approved constitution. But more likely, things will go on and the senate will continue its activities, Keller said.

"The constitution is still valid, it doesn't need approval from the trustees," Sullivan said. "But when the constitution is approved by the trustees, it will protect the rights we have in it," he said.

In addition to Duffey's recommendations, concerns have been raised by an attorney in University President David Knapp's office.

Knapp feels that the Third World Caucus overrides the one person, one vote principle, in the constitution, Sarah Boy, assistant to the vice chancellor of student affairs said. Basically, this means that a senator could be entitled to more than one vote if he or she is on the caucus while representing his or her dormitory.

"But the task force feel that the overriding principle (of minority representation) is more important," Boy, who is also coordinator of the constitution task force, said.

Boy said the task force is currently working on the president's comments. She said his greatest concern deals with this issue of student representation in the senate.

Divest stocks; fight racism speakers say

By RICHARD MARTIN
Collegian Staff

A representative from a political group outlawed in South Africa and an aide to Sen. Jack Backman (D-Newton), said last night that the University of Massachusetts should sell its stock in companies operating in South Africa to set an example for other investors and to create the downfall of its racist government.

Of South Africa's 31 million people, 23 million blacks have no vote in a political system legally controlled by the 4.5 million whites.

Solly Simelane of the African National Congress (ANC) was exiled from South Africa in the early 1960's and has been working through the ANC in New York City since then to "unite and mobilize all liberal groups of (South) Africa, and abrogate South Africa's racist policies."

Backman's aide, David Barenberg, 25, helped pass a state law in 1980 that requires the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to divest its pension funds from banks who invest in South Africa.

Simelane and Barenberg were invited to speak by the UMass student group, the South Africa Divestment Committee. SADC says UMass currently holds stock in three companies that do business in South Africa, which directly contradicts policy established by the Board of trustees in 1977. SADC has been pressuring University Treasurer Robert Brand, who is responsible for the school's investment portfolio, to sell UMass' stock in Foxboro Co, Thomas & Bett, and Procter & Gamble. As of yesterday, those stocks were valued at $176,198.25 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Simelane, who is in his late 40's said of blacks in South Africa, "Daily experience is one of violence. War is imposed on us by colonizers. The country is living in a virtual state of emergency due to security laws." Simelane cited examples from a slideshow which illustrated poverty, segregation, and police violence in his homeland.

"We call upon the international community to bring this monster (policy of apartheid) to its knees and chop its head off by cutting off all investments," Simelane said.

He said that an embargo on South Africa by international merchant seamen has helped bring pressure on the South African government.

Simelane said that international economic warfare against the government would bring eventual downfall because it would not be able to financially support the police and military who carry out the oppression of blacks.

Barenberg, a UMass graduate, said that divestment of American companies who do business in South Africa was crucial to bringing change in that country. However, achieving divestment was not a simple matter, he said.

Ex. official becomes hero

NEW YORK AP - Former Israeli Defense Minister Ariel Sharon is a national hero defamed by "an accusation of mass murder" in a magazine article, his lawyer said yesterday as the trial began in Sharon's $50 million libel suit against Time inc.

Sharon alleges that Time libeled him in a 1983 article on an Israeli investigation into the September 1982 massacre of hundreds of Palestinians in Beirut refugee camps following Israel's occupation of west Beirut.

The article stated that Sharon "participated in a conversation, which if... true, is an accusation of mass murder," said the former Cabinet member's lawyer, Milton Gould, in opening arguments.

The conversation in question occurred the day before the massacre by Lebanese Phalangist militiamen and a day after the assassination of Lebanese President-elect Bashir Gemayel, whose family controlled that militia.

Seagulls bomb executives

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. AP- Seagulls bombarding golfers with their own golf balls have sent Smith & Wesson executives diving for cover and forced the gun company to close its newly installed driving range.

"Clearly the birds think the balls are clams," said Jim Baird, conservation director for the Massachusetts Audubon Society. "It's typical Gull behavior to pick up clams and mussels and drop them again and again until the shell breaks."

Smith & Wesson President Lee J. Deters could not be reached for comment early Tuesday afternoon. His secretary said both Deters "and our man in charge of the gulls" were colseted in meetings.

However, a company official, who asked that his name not be used, told the Daily News in Springfield that shortly after the driving range was set up behind the gun company's sprawling headquarters complex, the birds began"cavorting with our balls."

Regents chairman: UMass 'world class institution'

By MICHELLE HYDE
Collegian Staff

•When David J. Beaubien was a University of Massachusetts student in the 1950s, it cost him about $50 a semester and the time it took to hitchhike 13 miles back and forth from Montague.

Because he was limited financially, he found it a natural choice to study at UMass.

'One hell of a bargain'

Now the chairman of the Massachusetts Board of Regents of Public Higher Education, Beaubien said that a UMass education is "one hell of a bargain," and knocks down student complaints of last year's seven percent tuition increase.

"I've heard students come to me and say 'If I have to pay an extra $72, I won't be able to come to school next year.' And he's got an $82 pair of Nike sneakers on his feet," he said.

"It isn't so much the $100, it's the option the child has to make," he said.

Last July, Gov. Michael S. Dukakis named Beaubien chairman of Regents, a 14-member body that set policies and oversees operations for the state's 29 public colleges and universities, and is responsible for about $500 million, or six percent of the state's budget.

In a recent interview at UMass, Beaubien said his ambitions for the regents and for Massachusetts higher education include making the state system the leading system of higher education in the country, yet maintaining access to its colleges and universities.

Make investments in education

Beaubien said one way to make the Massachusetts higher education system number one in the country is to lobby for more increases in state spending on higher education.

"It's best for Massachusetts to make these investments in education. It's one of the healthiest states in the nation economically," he said.

He describes Massachusetts as the "Mecca of higher education."

UMass has emerged as a world-class institution and is "clearly the flagship" of the state's colleges and universities, he said. "Unfortunately, the House of Representatives does not know that. We have to get them here to see the quality of this campus.

However, Beaubien said the regent's primary responsibility is maintaining access.

Beaubien said he recieved a solid liberal arts education at UMass and wants to ensure that all Massachusetts residents, especially minorities, have the same opportunity.

"It's not enough to say the door's open. We've got to reach out of that door and grab minority students, and create role models" for them, he said.

Tuition policy reviewed

Beaubien said one of the top agenda items this year is reviewing the tuition policy. It was the regents, and primarily Beaubien, who recommended a new tuition policy that would require students to pay up to one-third of the cost of their education and a 13 percent tuition hike that was capped to seven percent by the state Legislature.

Response to Beaubien as regents chairman has been generally favorable, Susan Lane, from Dukakis' Educational Advisory office said.

Beaubien is "taking the lead" in some of the issues of concern to the governor and the legislature, like the tuition policy, Lane said.

UMass Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey said Beaubien is making himself "very visible" on the UMass campus, visiting, talking to faculty and students and the physical plant, and "knows how the campus is operating before I do."

After graduating from UMass in 1957 with an electrical engineering degree, Beaubien and two friends founded Cambridge Systems, an environmental instrumentations firm, which they later sold to EG&G, Inc., a diversified high technology company. He joined the firm and is now a senior vice president of EG&G, which is now a billion dollar a year company. He is responsible for corporate growth through new and emerging technologies.

In addition to working at EG&G, Beaubien spends two days a week working as a regent. He is not paid for the regents position.

Beaubien joined the UMass/Amherst engineering advisory council in the 1970s and in 1980 was appointed to the UMass Board of Trustees. When the Board of Regents was formed under Gov. Edward J. King, he was named vice chairman.

He is also chairman of the regent's Administration and Finance Committee, and was recently appointed to the Board of Directors of the Massachusetts Technology Park Corporation by Dukakis.

Education officials request 22 % budget increase

BOSTON AP- Education officials recommended an overall 22 percent budget increase yesterday for public colleges in the state including the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, saying the money would help produce a welltrained workforce for the commonwealth's high technology industry.

The board of Regents of Higher Education approved the proposal and sent it to Gov. Michael S. Dukakis, who has urged all state agencies to keep their fiscal 1986 budget requests down as low as possible.

The regents' plan calls for the higher education system-15 community colleges, nine state colleges and three state universities, plus the central office - to receive a total of $681.0 million in fiscal 1986, which begins July 1, 1985.

That would be a 22 percent increase over the total allocation of $558.2 million in the current 1985 fiscal year.

Higher Education Chancellor John Duff, who proposed the budget to the regents, said the increase would continue a trend that saw Massachusetts' ranking jump from 50th to 30th in terms of state aid for higher education in the last three years.

Regents Chairman David J. Beaubien agreed, saying he hoped the "long dry spell" of minimal state aid for public colleges and universities was over.

Beaubien said tech firms were demanding more and better educated people and it was up to the state's schools to help produce them.

A breakdown of the regents' request showed $614 million of the money would go to maintaining current programs and $66.7 million would go for new initiatives and expansion.

The new initiatives included $10.5 million to pay for expanded engineering programs at the University of Lowell, UMass Amherst, Southeastern Massachusetts University and the Massachusetts Maritime Academy. Another $2 million would go for expanded nursing programs, mainly at the community colleges.

The second phase is participation in the Body Shop, an excercise and research facility operated by the Department of Excercise Science that uses machines to improve body strength.

"Before the program started three years ago, most employees ere not involved in a physical conditioning program," said James Turati, a UMass police officer for the past 10 years. "Now there are 70 members (including) police officers, security guards, and secretaries. They range in age from 22-52 and are involved in either Phase 1, Phase 2, or both," he said.

UMass police Chief Robert G. Joyce said, "People who are interested can be released for almost an hour on their shift for cardiovascular excercise."

"The program has improved my attitudes and initiative. It helps your conscientiousness and ambition" Fifield said. "It takes those things to get there and work out." Fifield added, "I'm really appreciative of it (the program). I'm a better officer because of it."

Chief Joyce, who hasn't participated in the program, cited another advantage of the program and said, "It knocks down (reduces) sick days."

Women's Studies celebrates anniversary

By LAUREEN DELANEY
Collegian Correspondent

Fads come and go as quickly as the tide, but there is one fad that hasn't faded, and that is the interest in women's studies courses on college campuses.

This year marks the 10th anniversary of the University of Massachusetts Women's Studies Program. The program, which began as an appendage of the nationwide women's movement, is now recognized as one of the "most mature and developed programs of its kind," according to Women's Studies Professor Joyce Berkman, who has been with the program since its inception.

Because there are two major women's colleges, Smith and Mount Holyoke, in the area, and there are two female college presidents, "it is difficult for the UMass administration not to acknowledge the legitimate ambitions of women," Berkman said.

"When I look at the positive side, the women's studies 10th anniversary is like a glass half-filled. I am thrilled with the immense gains that women's studies have made on campus. I take great satisfaction with the program's national reputation," Berkman said.

"When I look at the glass as half-empty, the euphoria fades and I see all the problems. We need more efficient ways of attracting minority students, and we have problems such as comparable worth and sexual harrassment that women's studies still has to deal with," she said.

The UMass Women's Studies program grew out of the bachelor's degree with independent concentration (BDIC) program and was approved by the faculty senate on March 21, 1974.

"Many students were pursuing women's studies anyway and the faculty was doing their own research, so it seemed to be the next step to have a women's studies program," Arlene Avakian, Women's Studies staff assistant said. There are 25 majors and 20 minors in the program, Avakian said.

Most women do not realize women's issues, usually, until they are out of college with a family and are working, Berkman said. "That's when they discover all the obstacles like poor day care, comparable worth or sexual harrassment.

"A university is a shelter to a young person.

There is little or no hardship, and if there is, most people believe it is a circumstance peculiar to them," Berkman said.

"If we could reach more women sooner, we could better prepare them for life after college," she said.

Two 20-year-olds break dorm window

Two 20-year old UMass students were arrested Saturday afternoon and charged with attempted breaking and entering by smashing a window in Gorman dormitory, UMass police reported.

According to police, the men broke a resident's window which they thought was a storage room window to gain access to the dormitory.

A 1975 Mercury Cougar, valued at $2,000, was reported stolen from lot 22 at 8 p.m. Friday.

Police reported a hit-and-run accident in lot 49 that caused more than $200 in damage to the passenger door of a Ford Escort Sunday afternoon.

The windshield of a Volkswagon, valued at $200, was reported smashed at 12:31 p.m. Friday, police said. The incident occurred in lot 22 between Nov. 1 and Nov. 9, police said.

Police reported a 19-year-old UMass student was arrested in lot 50 at 6:28 p.m. Saturday and charged with possession of an altered driver's license.

Two pool cues, valued at $180, were stolen from an unlocked room on the fourth floor of Patterson dormitory, police said. The theft occurred between Nov. 9 and 11:48 p.m. on Nov. 12, when it was reported.

Two car speakers, valued at $120, were stolen from a locked 1979 Buick parked on the first level of the Campus Center Garage, police reported. The theft was reported at 8:28 a.m. Saturday and police said access to the car was gained by using a coat hanger.

Fighting to end hunger

In recent weeks the world has been shocked by the news of the effects of the devastating famine in Ethiopia. Tomorrow all members of the University will have an opportuinity to contribute to the world wide effort to help Ethiopia. Tomorrow all members of the University will have an opportunity to contribute to the world wide effort to help Ethiopia and other countries where people are starving.

Tomorrow some UMass students will participate in a day of fast, donating their meal at the dining commons to Oxfam, a group helping to fight world hunger. We commend all those students who showed the forsight to sign-up with Oxfam last week and urge them to follow through with their commitment. We also urge the rest of the community to do their part by fasting and donating the money that they would have spent on food to Oxfam.

All too often the responsibility is placed on others to solve world problems. But the recent photographs showing the bodies of babies who died becasue the world did not hear their cries hows why we all need to work to end world hunger.

As painful as it is to hear those cries of help, we must not ignore them. It is easy to ignore something we have never felt. Few of us have ever felt real hunger. In addition to donating money to Oxfam we should fast so we can better hear the cries of hunger by experiencing, even in the slightest sense, hunger.

We must not let our commitment to fight world hunger end tomorrow. World hunger will not end with our donations. We must continue to be aware of the problem and work to help those in need more than one day a year.

Caught between two evils

Rod Clare
Christopher Williams

Well, the election is over and the war is done but let us now examine the results from a different perspective. Ronald Reagan won a landslide election with a high Democratic crossover rate that pulled in even women and the elderly. In fact, the election was so disasterous for Walter Mondale that the Democratic tree was almost ripped from the ground save for one root — the Black vote.

Mondale received 90 percent of the Black vote, actually more than Jimmy Carter got in 1980. This is attributable in part to Jesse Jackson's support of the Democratic ticket and to a Black distrust of Reagan. Now here is a man, Reagan, who carried only 9 percent of the Black vote and who when questioned about his lack of support from the Black community states that blacks haven't been allowed to get his message. This sounds strange coming from the mouth of "the great communicator," the man able to sway partisan crowd with a single quip. Perhaps Blacks got the message that under the Reagan administration their yearly pay has gone down while white income has risen.

As virtually every Black leader will tell you, the Reagan administration has been hostile to the Black agenda and to the Blacks at large. Yet still he won the election handidly with hardly any Black support. This fact will send a message to the Democratic leaders saying that if they hope to capture the next presidential election they will have to shift the party's orientation to the right.

This is not to say that Mondale's campaign was expected to be the savior of the Black people. In a sense Mondale was worse than Reagan because Blacks never voted for Reagan so he never really owed us anything. The phrase "what you see is what you get" never rang truer. Mondale, after winning the Democratic nomination, instead of saying that he understood the message Blacks were sending through Rev. Jackson, turned down all of his planks and later declared that he could defeat Reagan without his support.

During the election Mondale never said anything new to Blacks, only offering to put a few crumbs back on the table. There was no talk of the decling human rights situation and mass starvation that the people of Africa are facing. Nor was there any new talk on South Africa except for the warmed over liberal rambling that the situation can be solved peacefully, not much better than Reagan's talk of "constructive engagement."

What this election has candidly shown is that a winning party does not need the Black vote if whites are united. Blacks now need to seriously re-evaluate our position in American society and decide whether any party can help us, for in demanding rights we should assume responsibility for creating some of the opportunities ourselves. Black America possesses revenues of over $150 billion and with the right guidance, irrespective of Western or Soviet dogma, we can rise economically and thereby create our own political climate. As Malcolm X said, "The time when white people can come into our community and get us to vote for them so they can be our political leaders and do what they want is long gone."

Rod Clare and Chrispher Williams are UMass students.

Hysteria doesn't help

I read Stuart Gottlieb's column, Opening Our Eyes to Communist Aggression, in yesterday's Collegian with severe distaste. His comments illustrate what Mary Wentworth termed "communist hysteria." He expressed a fear that the airstrip being built in Grenada "happenned to be long enough to suit MIGs." I imagine that all international airports have runways that fit that description, even those in this country. So where does this fear come from? He says he doesn't "like the thought of communist aggression...but it's reality." How does he know what is reality in foreign countries where he probably hasn't been, such as Nicaragua and Grenada?

Who told him? Who instilled this fear? Then he says, "if people don't see the world for what it is, and what the U.S. does for world democracy, then they should keep their thoughts to themselves." I'd like to know what Gottlieb saw that determined what the world is for him. Furthermore, I'd like him to consider how U.S.-supported democracy in Chile, El Salvador, and Guatemala stand up to his ideals. In these countries, "democratic" governments maintain a strict level of military control. Atrocities against civilians are the norm. Lastly, I don't think anyone should keep their thoughts to themselves. Silence is not democracy.

Gottlieb Should consider why people oppose the U.S. government's policies. Many of us study the subject much more deeply than the network media. Personally, my viewpoint comes from traveling abroad in more than eight countries, including Nicaragua and some Western European countries. Here at home, our government urges communist hysteria. Submitting to this hysteria will in no way help the problems of the world's people.

The difficulty of being a modern Democrat

In the living room of my friends,Nat and Katherine, the three of us sat despairing over the Reagan victory. We all had worked valiantly for the Democratic ticket and were just beginning to taste defeat. I, tasting it, broke silence and let out one big "yuck." Katherine agreed, saying, "exactly." After seeing enough of the Mondale trouncing we turned off the TV and Nat and I went down to the center of Northampton to drown our progressive sorrows in ice cream or something.

Dragging ourselves through town, Nat suggested that we stop in at the Mondale-Ferraro headquarters. That was exactly what I needed. I just had to be surrounded by those who felt the same way that I did; feeling the sting of disillusionment yet knowing the work was well worth it, somehow.

Right before we left the office a little boy, about eight years old, looked up at me and flashed the widest grin I've seen in too long a time. Collin, still smiling, told me that he could guess whom I had voted for: Mondale. I smiled back and said, "Yes, I did." He then explained that "people voted for Reagan because they just didn't understand." That is yet the best anlaysis of the election I"ve heard so far. He then related to me how he had voted in his second grade class and how Mondale had won 16 to 2. He was quite proud of that.

I shook hands with Collin and told him what a pleasure it was meeting him. Heading for the door I waved to him and said, "Take it easy, kid." He waved back with all the glee he could muster. Right then he shone with all the goodness, innocence and determination that I believe America is all about.

I knew as I walked out with Nat and headed for Herrel's that I would have quite a few battles ahead of me in the next four years. But as long as there is one Collin left in the world, I could do it. As long as there are children born into the world threatened by nuclear war, racism, sexism, hunger, increasing overpopulation, heterosexism, and a deteriorating environment, I knew I had to continue.

Sipping coffee and savoring chocolate ice cream, I sighed and thought to myself, "shit, it's hard being a democrat these days."

Romance: an issue shunned by the media

Can you believe it?

I wish to bring to the attention of the UMass community a grave situation. Amidst all the "excitement" of the elections, I believe a few things have been overlooked and forgotten by the media. I'm talking about the engagement of Jennifer Sheerin (who goes to UMass) and Jim Witous (who does not) which was to take place on the David Letterman show, but due to his vacation plans (Can you believe the audacity of the man?), the engagement did not take place.

We, the friends of Jenny and Jim, make a plea to you, the hopeless romantics of UMass and its surrounding areas, to help us correct this gross injustice by sending your cards and letters to Dave, asking him to bring Jen and Jim to his show on November 22nd, so that they may get engaged on national television.

For your aid, we will provide you with Mr. Letterman's address: David Letterman, NBC Studios, 30 Rockefeller Plaza, N.Y., N.Y. 10112.

Please get involved with this cause for the two nicest people you'll never know!

'Self-proclaimed compassion' falls short

I must commend Rusty Denton (Nov. 8); you have a hell of a lot of nerve. To be in the unfortunate position of having been born a (probable) white upper-middle-class, Christian male must have caused you much pain. You'd probably also like to hear me say that I, as a woman, am overjoyed that you take such an interest in dictating what you believe I should be doing with my body and my life. Unfortunately, Denton, your self-proclaimed compassion fell a bit short in my book. The vast majority of complications caused by abortions occur when an abortion is performed illegally; in unsanitary back rooms, by quacks; 'friends,' or by the patient herself, because they couldn't afford to have a safe, legal abortion. Do you honestly believe that the same woman who cannot afford an abortion which usually costs under $300, can afford the expensive pre-natal and hospital care necessary? This is not even mentioning the money lost from time taken off of work.

About all the 'thousands of childless couples' you mentioned; there are thousands of children in adoption agencies just dying to join up with some parents. But the vast majority of those children are Black, Hispanic, Asian, or handicapped. It seems most of those parents want bouncing babies that are also white, with all 10 fingers and toes. It's obvious that most of the women who gave up their children for adoption couldn't afford to keep them; and being that women of color constitute one of the largest, if not the largest, population living in poverty. I can only say that maybe you should research or at least think a little more thoroughly before making such absolute statements. Your class background is showing.

I have also seen the emotional upheavel a woman feels following an abortion. But what of the emotional upheaval of giving up a baby you've brought to term, and painfully given birth to? And what of the ridicule and pain of being unmarried and pregnant in a society that still punishes only women for having sex? Those "few months" of sadness you mentioned could mean the loss of a job, a high school or college education, a family, and the same self-respect that you said would be lost if they'd had an abortion.

Although you tried to get people to believe that you are compassionate,Denton, I can only come to the conclusion that you are a misogynist, and viciously classist.

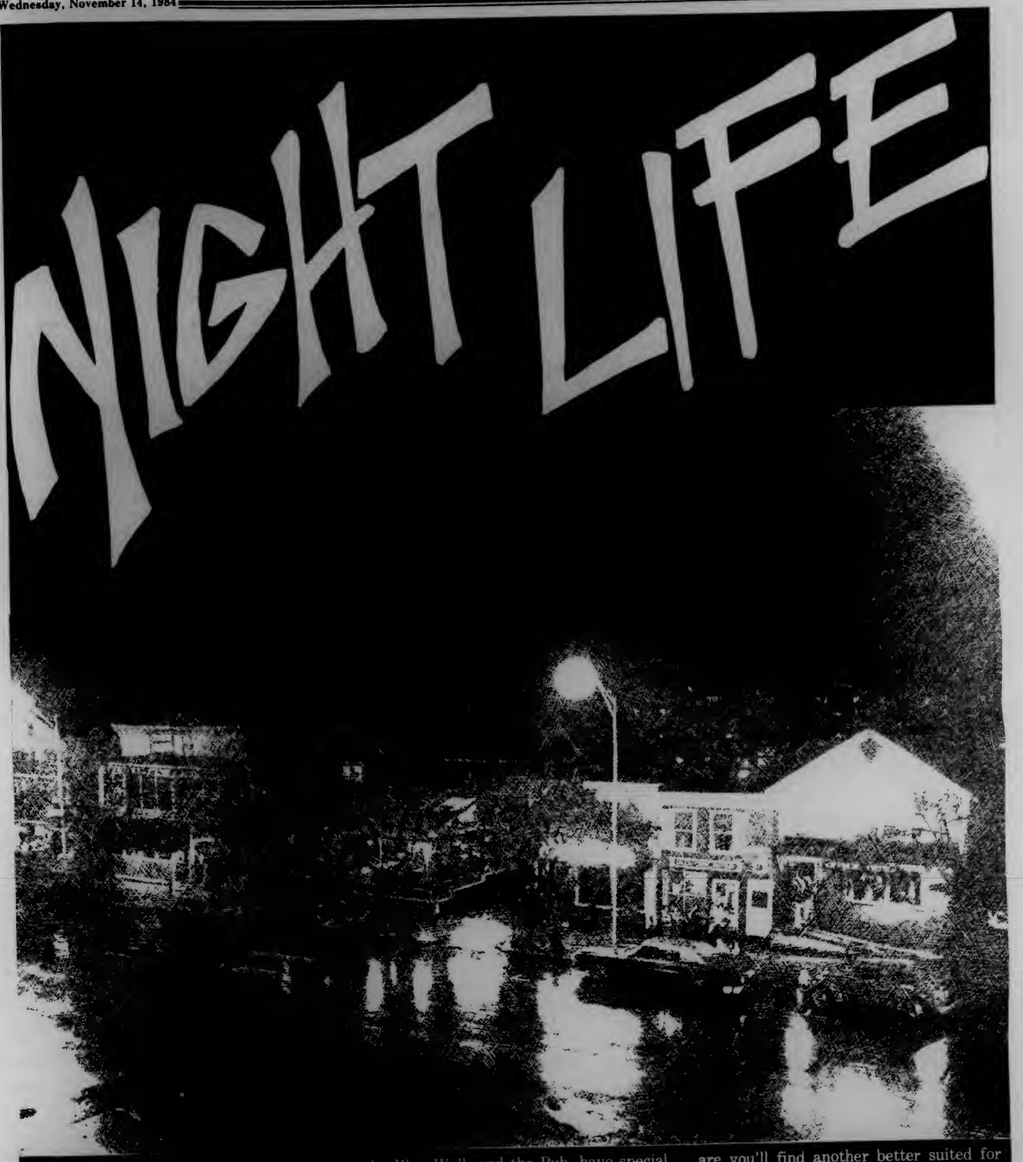
NIGHT LIFE



During the day it's Shakespeare, Marxist theory and the discovery of the atom that fills the minds and time of five college students. But at night the books are put away, the slide rules are locked in the top drawer and the haven for scholars is transformed into something just short of Broadway.

It's nightime in the Valley.

Nightime in the area is more than just clubs with live and recorded music, bars, movies theaters, plays, or comedy acts, it is a time for social gathering to meet old and new friends, to forget about life for a while and just to have a good time.

There are at least three large dance clubs in the area. Changes and Justin Ryan's in Amherst, and Pearl Street in Northampton. Many other bars including the Blue Wall, and the Pub, have special nights set aside for dancing to a D.J.

For live music, this area can rival much larger towns like Springfield, Providence, R.I. and Hartford, Conn. on a good weekend. The largest concert venture in the area is the UMass Fine Arts Center, and smaller bars like Sheehan's in Northampton, the Rusty Nail in Sunderland and even the Hatch in the Campus Center have bands playing rock'n'roll and blues every weekend.

If dancing isn't your niche, don't despair, downtown Amherst and Route 9 offer more than just dance floors. Here the relaxing student finds a wide variety of places for drinking beer, wine, mixed drinks or anything. If you're in a bar you don't like, walk a little further and chances are you'll find another better suited for you and your needs.

But you don't have to drink to have a good time in the valley at night. Each of the Five Colleges has its own theater company, and UMass has three; the Rand, the Curtain and the New World theaters. Every area college also shows a variety of commcercial and art films are showing at the malls and in downtown Amherst and Northampton.

Pizza rolls and Jiffy Pop just aren't good enough. With all the area has to offer there's no excuse to sit in your dorm room or a apartment and become part of the furniture. Nightime in the valley is just too plentiful for that.

Alive and well:

A survey of the area's music scene shows you can get some satisfaction

By JACK BRESNAHAN
Collegian Staff

Sometimes, especially if you are a blues fan, the valley is the place to be to see live music. James Cotton, John Mayall, George Thorogood and the late Muddy Waters all have played in the area in the past several years. But lots of other, nationally known and popular acts also play Amherst area bars on a regular basis.

The following is a list of spots in the area where one can go to hear and enjoy live music.

IRON HORSE — The Iron Horse is located on Center Street, Northampton. It is one of the most consistent clubs around, able to book many fine music acts. I've seen blues artists Albert Collins, Son Seals, and Koko Taylor in the past. Recently Mike Bloomfield was there, as well as the great Archie Shepp Quartet. UMass alumnus and blues great Taj Mahal is due to play in December. There are a number of solo and diverse acts most everyday of the week. My only wish is that they'd expand the place and put in a dance floor.

CALVINS — On Fiske Avenue in downtown Greenfield, Calvins is an unpretentious and friendly place. This is more or less a working persons bar. There's a full circular bar, with plenty of tables and chairs, and a dance floor in front of the bandstand. It's not real close to UMass but worth the travel. Regular bands are Wailin' Dave and the Blue Dogs, Roger Saboom and the Strugglers, Sass, and the highly enjoyable Fabulous Heavyweights with Ed Vadas. We need a place like this in Amherst.

SHEEHANS — Sheehans is on Pleasant Street, Northampton, and is one of the more popular spots in town. It has three bars: the upstairs one, which is cheaper to drink at, and two downstairs, where live music is played. There is no cover charge, there's ample seating, as well as a dance floor. The only lion in the path is the brick pillars which somewhat obscure the stage and the low ceiling impeding the sound quality. R&B can often be heard by Wildcat O'Halloran, Albert Otis Blues Band, Al Fuller, and Bobby Watson. Evening Pro Blusica is a weekly show, usually on Friday nights.

THE BLUE WALL — Our very own, everyone knows where the Blue Wall is. UPC's Blues in The Blue Wall series has brought some fine groups such as Johnny Copeland, Son Seals, James Cotton, John Mayall, and Canned Heat. The management has also brought rock bands in like The Lonely Boys, David Johannsen, The DBS, The Bongos, and Lou Miami. I think the Wall would do well to book bands more often, since it's not always easy for everyone to get off campus to go elsewhere.

THE NORTH STAR — Situated across from Smith College's Forbes Library bands can be heard here on occassion. Though usually a DJ and dancing place, bookings are also available for parties and bands. Owners David and Ken keep a very pleasant atmosphere, and there should be more bands playing there in the future.

PEARL STREET — This is one of Northampton's newer and more successful clubs and is much needed in the area. It sort of fills up the void created by the closing of Rahars a couple of years ago. The Outlaws played there last week, and Phoebe Snow enjoyed a tremendous evening a few weeks ago. Bluesman Clarence "Gatemouth" Brown as well as James Brown played there this summer. Swing band Eight to the Bar is due to play on Nov. 28th, and ska band The Good Guys will be there on Dec. 6.The interior is spacious and clean, with plenty of space to boogy.

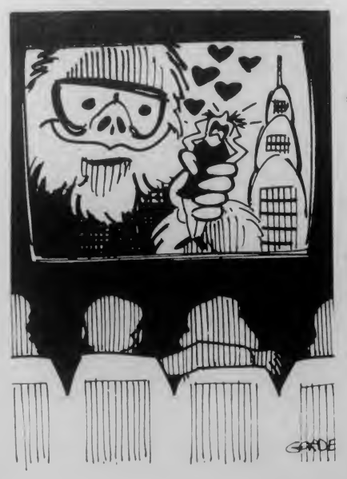
1704 — This lounge is located at the Motel 6, South Deerfield. It's one of the most comfortable places to see a band, with nice soft chairs and carpeting. They had stopped booking bands for a few months, but beginning in December, there should be a complete line-up again. Some of their bands in the past have included Arabus, Raisin' Cain, Temptress, Cruise Control, and Skyline. This past weekend Flyer was there and the place was packed, possibly a sign of things to come.

THE RUSTY NAIL — For the past several years this club has been one of the forces to be reckoned with. Though it is way down Rte.47 in Sunderland, this is the place in the area to see national acts. Blues greats like Muddy Waters, John Lee Hooker, Willie Dixon, Johnny Winter, B.B. King, James Cotton, James Montgomery, Bonnie Raitt, George Thorogood, and Stevie Ray Vaughan have all played the Nail. Diverse groups such as Warren Zevon, X, The Ramones, Root Boy Slim, Bruce Cockburn, and The Dead Kennedys have been a few of the many to have appeared. Its capacity has swelled beyond belief on occassion, and it is amazing that they can get these big names to play way out there. Case in point, Robin Trower will be there on Dec. 7th. Lucky us!.

Where art and entertainment mix

By COUNT RAMIN ZAHED
Collegian Staff

It might sound fashionable to say that the Amherst area does not have enough good movie houses for the cosmopolitan film buff. However, this is far from the truth. It might take a while before the classy films arrive, but they are eventually shown in the long run. One simply has to practice the art of patience.



The Pleasant Street Theatre in Northampton is usually the ideal place to see good foreign and domestic films. The theatre has one large screening room and another smaller one for older classics or for independent productions. Tickets usualy go for $4.50. The only problem with the house is that one can not bring candy bars to the theatres. Otherwise, the place is a feast for the college Bohemian.

Speaking of cozy places, one definitely has to mention the snug Amherst Cinema, the home of the perfect double features. Tickets merely cost $2.50, and there is plenty of room in the theatre. Located in downtown Amherst, the cinema is conveniently close to Bart's so you can pick up a hot cup of apple cider before or after the films. I personally suggest it for a romantic winter date.

The Calvin Theatre in Northampton is another bargain place in the area. On Wednesday nights, the theatre offers a current commereial hit (Ghostbusters) for only 99 cents. On regular nights, tickets cost a buck and a half.

"It might take a while before the classy films arrive, but they are eventually shown in the long run. One simply has to practice the art of patience."

Competing with the Pleasant Street Theatre in presenting quality films is the posh Academy of Music at the gates of Smith college. I have to admit I am always impressed with the interior beauty of the Academy. Although the management chooses to show older double features at times, the usual ticket price is $3.50. I hear Smith women simply adore the Academy.

Last, but certainly not least, there are the mall cinemas. Hampshire Mall theatres along with Mt. Farm Cinemas bring the latest commercial releases to the Amherst area. Although they tend to give priority to those abominable teenage sex and violence comedies, they also carry good movies like Amadeus or Places in the Heart from time to time. They might not be ritzy, but they surely have good deals for students and for the Twilight Shows. On weekends, one can also catch a midnight movie or two if one feels zany enough. Of course the PVTA bus ride back home probably offers more thrills than any film can possibly offer.

The Amherst cinema had a popular double-feature this weekend. There are more than a dozen films playing at any given time at theaters within five miles of downtown Amherst.

Of course, one must also mention the wide range of films sponsored by various organizations in the Five College Area every week. If they are not free, entrance price is usually a dollar and a half, and it sure beats waiting out in the cold for the bus.

Let the pretentious criticize our cultural facilities. Amherst can still give us many great films on a bleak and bland winter night.

Tell me, where have all the good bars gone?

Drake, Dastardly Dan's on the way out — Local tastes changing?

By MARY CRESSE
Collegian Staff

First it was Barselotti's. Then it was Dastardly Dan's. This June, the Village Inn, popularly known as The Drake, will be shutting off its taps and, with them, the last bastion of a socially relaxed, pleasingly alcoholic atmosphere where Hendrix replaces Maddonna on the jukebox and people play pool instead of head games.

What gives? Do the twin killings of The Drake and Dastardly Dan's signify a tendency of Amherst bars to shy away from a "normal" bar atmosphere without ubiquitous deejays or drink specials? Are "Oreo Cookies" beating out Michelob drafts in sales? In short, where will the non-Ralph Lauren crowd go?

Surveyed late on Friday, Drake patrons stared past their double dark drafts and told why they came.

"No leg warmers, man."

"The bartender doesn't ring a stupid bell every time he makes a sale."

"I like to be able to sit here and just drink if I want to and have no one bother me."

"There'll be no place to go," says Drake barfly and senior Ed Shaughnessy, who has been frequenting Willy's Rathskelbar since he first came to UMass. "It's the only place in town where older people and younger ones can mix and drink with no one making a big deal of anything." He shakes his head. "I can't think of any replacement, really."

Mark Zuckerman, also a senior, confers, "It is pretty sad because the Drake is the only place that doesn't have any pretensions. You can go there, have a drink, and talk all night. You don't feel as if you have to do anything."

There is hope. Part of it originates on North Pleasant Street, where a 22-year-old UMass undergrad has taken the old Dastardly Dan's (previous owner Paul Noetel is pursuing other business interest in South Amherst) and is in the process of turning it into the "The Spoke," a bar that he hopes will attract all types. Miles Washburn is a biking enthusiast who is expanding his interest into the decor of the shop; besides covering up the intimidating bay window with a curtain (face it, who wants to sit in a bar and drink when you get the idea everyone walking past can see you making bad pool shots), he will decorate the shop with antiques dating as far back as 1870.

Washburn wants it to be "a place where you can take a date," but also where "a woman can walk in alone and not be harrassed by men.

"We'll also be playing tapes. I have about 100 myself, and people can hand me one and request what they like." Washburn said. "If they want to hear the Grateful Dead, we'll play the Dead; if they want Springsteen, we'll play Springsteen."

A familiar figure behind the sunken Drake bar is a short, black woman by the name of Ethel Clemons, 42, has been tending bar there for five years and hates "as much as anyone here" the "plastic" bars springing up uptown. Ethel says she might open up her own Drake-like bar, if she can raise the capital.

"I'm trying to get my boyfriend to mortgage his house, but unless I win Megabucks in the near future," she laughs, "I don't know about that possibility. Believe me," she says, "I see the need."

Downstairs bartender Withe Whitfield has also said he will try to open his own place if the Drake closes.

There seems little doubt that members of the Drake community will keep tabs on Ethel. But until then — and, of course, seeing how the new bars pan out — there is only one definite majority opinion:

"It's an absolute shame," says Chris Marini, a senior who counts herself lucky to have gone to The Drake as often as she has. "A damn shame."

Clubs cope with strict new laws

By JOHN O'CONNELL
Collegian Staff

This fall, Mike's Westview Cafe and the Pub both changed their advertising in the Collegian to emphasize food, entertainment and door prizes instead of alcohol.

Then the Blue Wall's famous Friday happy hour was renamed the Friday afternoon social hour, and the Top of the Campus changed its drink specials from two-for-ones to lower priced normal sized drinks.

Also this fall, police stepped up their attack on drunk driving through the use of roadblocks and special patrols, trends showed bar patrons drinking less, and a moratorium on local happy hours is being drafted.

Are all these events related? Yes.

They are all part of a national alcohol-awareness education program that was begun by groups like Mothers Against Drunk Driving (MADD) and has made its way into the state legislatures and finally to the U.S. Congress, which this summer passed a bill that requires all states to set a legal drinking age of 21 or face cut-off of federal highway money usually a large part of any state budget.

The Massachusetts Legislature recently passed a bill that will raise the legal drinking age from 20 to 21 in June.

The Pub, Mike's Westview and UMass campus bars are not the only area bars that have made changes to accomodate increased alcohol awareness measures. Most clubs and bars in the Amherst area have also tried to de-emphasize hard drinking in favor of other activities.

Chick Delano, owner of Delano's in downtown Amherst, said he is "thinking of doing a late-night menu," to supplement the bar's happy hour.

Delano said he thinks people are not drinking less, but drinking more responsibly," because of the Amherst Police Safety and Alcohol Patrol (SAP) and State Police roadblocks.

Tom Stoddard, a manager of the Rusty Nail in Sunderland, said that "overall, the amount of money people spend in clubs is less" now, and he blamed that on "the mood of the day roadblocks, drunk driving."

Michael Kane, general manager of Changes in Amherst, said he tries to create "a total atmosphere good sound, dancing, videos.

"My idea has never been to try to get everyone in here as drunk as they can," Kane said. The club always has hotdogs for sale now, and the Thursday night specials include free hotdogs and hamburgers, he said.

"When people eat, they tend not to get as drunk," Kane said.

Dan Cowles, who has worked in bars and clubs in the area for 10 years, and now is a manager of Justin Ryan's in Amherst, said "everybody's doing about the same thing" in response to the tougher drinking-related laws.

"The focus of everyone's ad campaigns are going away from two for ones and open bars," he said.

Cowles also said customers don't drink as much as they used to. "It used to be that UMass students would drink until they couldn't stand up," he said, but now, "people are not drinking shots as much," and many customers drink soda or juice after midnight until closing.

Put on those dancing shoes

Boogie the night away to pulsating sounds at area dance clubs

By ANNE McCRORY
Collegian Staff

Whether you call them discotheques, nightclubs, discos or dance clubs, they all mean one thing: a darkened hall that pulsates with bass, atmosphere and mixed company for an eventful night out.

Amherst, of course, is not New York, or Boston, and doesn't have a Studio 54 or even a Metro. But there are several local establishments that aspire to fill one's boogeying needs, and while these clubs do not accomodate bands or non-mainstream type dance music, each club does have its own personality. Here is the basic rundown:

Pearl Street, Pearl Street, Northampton
Open: 8 p.m. to 1 a.m. Tuesday-Saturday
Cover charge: $2 Tuesday and Thursday; $1 Wednesday; $3 Friday and Saturday, more if there's live entertainment.

The club is the newest on the area's disco scene; it offers upbeat, diverse music (new wave, punk, etc. as well as top 40). The club is located on the second floor of an immense building. The foyer has a bar and pastel neon lightin; Beyond this passageway lies a huge, darkened hall where the action takes place.

Pearl Street has the largest dance floor I've seen — and little else, in the way of tables for a relaxing drink. There are comfortable couches, though, to get to know your new friends and watch the TV monitors with the latest music videoes.

Justin Ryan's Route 9 and University Drive, Amherst
Open: Upstairs (disco) 8 p.m. to 1 a.m., Wednesday-Saturday; downstairs (kick-off lounge) 7 p.m. to 1 a.m., seven nights a week.

Cover charge: $1 after 9 p.m. Friday and Saturday

This club is popular for its diversity — dance upstairs, watch TV and play pool downstairs. Music is predominatly Top 40 with some rock; two dance floors offer more than 400 square feet each. There are plenty of booths and tables for enjoying the various drink specials: $1.25 well drinks with a free buffet till 10 p.m. Wednesday, beat-the-clock drinks from 7 p.m. to 11 p.m. Thursday, $1.25 drinks till 9 p.m. weekends.

Other attractions include drawings for prizes such as trips to Florida; eight will be given away with drawings every two weeks. Live entertainment, such as Jim Plunkett, frequents the Local theater enriching

Shakespeare, Chekhov fill area with culture

Students looking for a night out at the theater will not lack a performance on most weekends. The area has its share of local theater groups, both traditional and non-traditional. But possibly the richest source of theater entertainment are the five college theater departments.

The UMass Department of Theater is having one of its busiest seasons in recent years, presenting five plays in its theaters.

The Rand Theater housed a production of Eugene O'Neill's Desire Under the Elms for six nights in early October. Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream will be presented in the Rand December 6-8 and 12-14.

The Curtain Theater opened its fall '84 season with a dramatic adaptation of Donald Barthelme's Porcupines at the University and Other Comic Diversions. Chekhov's The Seagull had a short but successful run Oct. 30-November 3. Howard Brenton's Sore Throats, a controversial play about sex and marriage, will run November 13-17.

The New World Theater at UMass, which presents non-European plays, is producing three plays in its tenth season this fall. Love to All, Lorraine, a drama based on the life of late playwright Lorraine Hansberry, opened the season Oct. 13 at the theater. On Nov. 17, the New World Theater presents Life in the Fast Lane, starring Japanese-Hawaiian poet Lane Nishikawa. The final production of the season will be Migeul Pinero's Short Eyes, a powerful look at racial tension inside a prison.

The other area colleges also have full theater schedules planned. At Hampshire College this week is Wendy Kesselman's My Sister in this House. Harold Pinter's The Lover will be performed at Hampshire December 5-8. Michael Tremblay's Les Belles Soeurs can be seen at Smith College December 6-8 and 12-14. At Mount Holyoke College a two part adaptation of Thackery's Vanity Fair is in the works. Part I can be seen November 29 and December 1, 4, 6, and 8. Part II plays November 30, December 1, 5, 7, and 9. Either single performance will stand alone, but to get the entire story one should see both.

Changes Route 9, Amherst (about 1½ miles from town)
Open: 8 p.m. to 1 a.m. Tuesday-Saturday
Cover Charge: $1 after 9 p.m. Friday, Saturday

Changes, formerly Poor Richards, changed ownership last Spring and renovated itself in the works. There is now a split-level dance floor, with a combined area of more than 400 square feet. New-fangled couches (Nine Lansdowne Street-style) line another wall for those too pooped to party to the top 40 dance music.

Drink specials include 50 cent drafts on Tuesday, 99 cent mixed drinks on Wednesday night and a women's aerobics contest — for a $250 prize — beginning this Friday.

Scouting U Conn

Huskies a tough foe for UM

By GERRY deSIMAS
Collegian Staff

This 1984 women's soccer season has been one of change for the University of Connecticut women's soccer team, the opposition for the fourth-seeded University of Massachusetts in the NCAA semi finals Saturday at 11:30 a.m. at the Final Four at the University of North Carolina.

The Huskies, who were ranked sixth in the country, are in the position of underdogs after being the top ranked team in the country for most of last season.

the Final Four

UMass, now top ranked in New England, beat UConn 2-0 in the regular season in Farminton, Conn. and owns a 1-0 consolation round win over the Huskies from last year's Final Four.

Last year, UConn was the team to beat. They were ranked first in the country and coming off two previous third place finishes(AIAW in 1981 and NCAA in 1982), Connecticut and young coach Len Tsantiris were looking for the National title.

George Mason spoiled UConn's undefeated season and knocked them off just like UConn did to top seeded and previously undefeated Brown on Saturday with a 1-0 quarter final win.

UConn, 16-3-2, has overcome early season injuries to come around in the playoffs. "We have really come together as a unit,"Donna MacDougall, UConn's third leading scorer said. "We are playing much better now than earlier in the season."

The addition of junior Missy Morrone, the daughter of UConn's men's coach Joe Morrone, who has recovered form early season back and ankle problems and has started the last 14 games.

Starting goalie Laura Skaza, who gave up the two goals in the UMass game, has overcome a head injury and started in goal in the Huskies last two playoff wins. In 10 games, Skaza has 0.75 goals-against-average.

Two probable starters will not play. Sophomore foward Lori Kessel has mononucelois and back Linda Jackson hyper-extended her knee in the first round playoff game against Cortland State. She's questionable.

Still, it should be a real battle with the winner getting a crack at either number 1 22-0-1 North Carolina or the 13-3-1 University of California Golden Bears.

"I think it will be a very tough game," Tsantirtis said.

Some more ramblings and such

Peter Abraham

Not that anyone cares what I think, but...

The Miami Dolphins will not go undefeated. No way.

The UMass men's soccer team deserves a lot of credit. From doormats to the Top 20 (even for just a week) was a fine accomplishment.

The Detroit Tigers bored me.

The New York Mets didn't.

The Celtics will repeat, the Knicks are centerless, the Sixers are aging and Kareem had his last fling last season.

Why? Larry Joe Bird is the best damn basketball player in America today. That's why. He makes all us slow white boys feel good about ourselves.

Is it me, or do the Bruins change players every three days? Hockey is the world's worst sport. Until they stop fighting and consolidate the truly bad teams, I won't watch it.

Anyone who says the Collegian doesn't cover women's sports well is wrong. Ask the players and coaches. I just love the psuedo-fans who complain when they read one issue. Read the paper every day folks.

Wade Boggs should always be a Red Sox.

Mark Clear shouldn't.

Take basketball (it's easy), football (you play only half the game and walk most of the time) and baseball (be serious) and throw them away as "tough" sports. Lacrosse is the hardest sport going, period.

I think John McNamara is going to be all right. My sister could write out the starting lineup (Boggs, Evans, Rice, Armas, Easler, Buckner, Gedman, Barrett and Guitierez). Just come up with lefthanded relief, another long reliever and it's Miller time for the Stockings.

Is anyone sorry to see Gary Allenson go?

Quick, name me a Vancouver Canuck.

Michael Jordan will be the best rookie this season, the best guard next season, and the best player of the next ten years after that. Once he learns the specifics, look out.

I can't wait to see the Knicks suffer through a horrible season. Cartwright has Bill Walton's injury (stress fracture of the foot), Webster is a head case, and Bernard will have to deal with double and triple teams for a whole season.

Any real college football fan will watch the Nebraska-Oklahoma game on Saturday. I can't wait to hear Frank Broyles drawl, "Keith, look at that Spencer Tillman, look at him." If you're into pain and suffering hit the stadium and watch the UMass-New Hampshire game.

Bob Stull is a good coach. Give the Minutemen three years and we'll be in the 1-AA championship. Give it time. Holy Cross was terrible in 1980. Remember when BC couldn't win a game ? Even the Celties had a bad streak.

But linebacker Dave Cavanaugh is a player right now, so is Glenn Holden.

Watch for the Atlantic 10's John Battle (Rutgers) and Mike Brown (George Washington) when they play against UMass thisseason. They're worth the three bucks to go to Springfield.

Finally, where have you gone Ernie "The Big Cat" Ladd?

Women's swimming falls to Smith despite Feinberg's three wins

Equestrian team closes season with victory

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

Senior Elizabeth Feinberg remained undefeated in the sprint freestyles, but the University of Massachusetts' women's swimming team went to 0-2 on the season with a 73-67 loss at home to Smith College.

Feinberg, who has recorded the best times in New England according to coach Bob Newcombe, won the 200 freestyle (1:59.75), the 50 freestyle (:25.80) and the 100 freestyle (:55.93). She is 6-0 in those three events through two meets.

Freshman Margaret Cameron won both the 100 breaststroke and the 200 breaststroke and was third in the 500 freestyle.

A number of lifetime bests also came out of the meet, Nancy Stephens (100 and 200 butterflies), Sue Freitas (200 backstroke and 200 individual medley), Carolyn Collins (200 backstroke) and Michelle Di Biasio (200 breaststroke) all turned in personal career bests.

"We're swimming really well," Newcombe said. "Last season we lost to Smith by 30 points, so we're improving.

"We had 15 people qualify for the New England Championships. I'm very pleased despite being 0-2."

The UMass equestrian team shook off the effects of rain and the ensuing mud to win the Post College Intercollegiate Horse Show in Waterbury, CN on Sunday.

The Minutemen defeated rival Mount Holyoke and Smith College with nine first place ribbons and five second place awards.

The team was led by sophomores Jennifer Verril and Dana Penn, who under the coaching of junior Anne Young, won both their individual jumping and flat classes. Penn was the high point rider for the show after a ride-off with two other competitors.

The 14-member team, which has finished up its fall season, stands a solid chance of being the high point team in the area, which is awarded with a berth in the Intercollegiate National Horse Show in Kentucky in early May.

Seven UMass riders would represent the region in Kentucky if UMass wins the local title.

Senior Elizabeth Feinberg won three events but the UMass women's swimming team lost to Smith.

Georgetown number one as college ball opens

By the Associated Press

Georgetown, the defending national champion, was overwhelmingly selected as the nation's No.1 team Tuesday in the Associated Press' preseason college basketball poll.

The Hoyas, who return 7 foot, two-time All-American center Patrick Ewing as well as 84 percent of their offense from last season when they won a school-record 34 games against three losses, received 55 first place votes and 1,248 rating points from a nationwide panel of 63 sportswriters and bradcasters.

Illinois was No. 2, followed by DePaul, Indiana and Oklahoma.

Two longtime members of the Top Twenty, however, were missing.

North Carolina, which finished No. 1 last season before losing in the NCAA tournament, was 21st in the preseason the first time science 1972 that the Tar Heels have not started a season ranked.

And UCLA did not get a single point in failing to make the preseason poll for the first time since it began an unprecedented streak of seven straight NCAA championships in the mid-1960s.

Illinois, which finished 26-5 last season and fell one game short of the Final Four, collected four first-place votes and 1,044 points.

Climate for grad women poor, says prof

Suffer limited access

By DEBORAH ROSS
Collegian Staff

Graduate women at the University of Massachusetts must work in an academic context where women are underrepresented, under-employed and underpaid, according to Barbara Love, Professor in the School of Education.

Speaking last night to graduate women students in a lecture entitled "The Academic Climate for Graduate Women' she said "This is your context, how are you going to succeed?"

A major problem, according to Love, is that there are so few women faculty members. Graduate women have "fewer role-models, mentors, people to speak up for them or talk to" she said.

"If you are dealing with a primarily male faculty" she said "you are dealing with certain sets of assumptions and attitudes about women."

Such attitudes may take the form of "they are only here until they get married and have a family" which results in "graduate women feeling they don't really belong," she said.

Men's traditional assumptions about women "translates into problems men have evaluating women's work," she said, and added that frequent sexual harassment also arose because of these assumptions.

She told the audience that they consequently "had limited access to the opportunities accessible to most graduate students."

She said "powerlessness" characterized the academic climate for graduate women students in which "male professors have power over you because you want a degree."

It is these professors, according to Love, "who decide what are important topics, who decide what is to be learned and who have final approval on a dissertation topic."

For graduate women students to succeed in this academic climate they must be clear about "the structure of the University, the roles being played, and the expectations being held" she said.

The talk was sponsored by the Women's Admissions and General Education Support (WAGES) Program which operates from the Everywoman's Center.

Award nominations due today

Teachers recognized for 'extra special effort'

By SEAN CASEY
Collegian Staff

Today is the last day for students to nominate faculty members or student teachers for the 1984-85 Distinguished Teachers Award.

Any UMass student or alumni may nominate teachers for the $2000 award, which goes to three faculty and three student teachers every academic year.

"The award gives recognition to teachers who give extra special effort on behalf of their students," said Sanjiv Dugal, president of the Graduate Student Senate, which oversees the award through the Graduate Dean's office.

Last year's winners of the award were Professors Julius Lester from the Afro American Studies department, Seymour Shapiro from the botany department, and Andy Anderson from sociology, and student teachers W. David Snowball, William Rising and Mary Brydon-Miller.

The graduate senate office receives about 90 nominations for faculty and about 20 for student teachers.

Nominated teachers are evaluated in their present classes and in their classes next semester by their students on evaluation forms. This year, evaluation responses will be correlated by computer for the first time.

Oxfam hopes for 2,000 in hunger fast

By LORI KIRKLAND
Collegian Correspondent

Today, students have the opportunity to save some of the 28 people around the world who starve to death every minute, according to Dan Stockford, president of the UMass Hunger Task Force.

Although legal disputes almost killed the program, the task force found a way around a law prohibiting Student Trust Fund money from being given to charity. By filling out rebate cards each student gives legal authority for funds to be donated. The dining commons run on Student Trust Fund money.

This is the fifth year that the task force, in conjunction with Oxfam America has collected money from UMass. Last year, UMass donated $2560 to Oxfam.

The complication, however, will probably not affect student turnout Stockford said. "Though the turnout last year was slightly under 1,700, I'm hoping for at least 2,000 students to participate this year," said Stockford. He added that his goal is to have 5,000 students participate, but "people are out of touch with the situation. They don't realize what starvation really is and how much we take for granted."

"Fifteen million people die of hunger every year and that is something most Americans can't perceive," he said.

The group hopes the fast will raise awareness of the problem as it feeds the hungry, according to Talin Tamzarian, a member of the task force. It seems that "not too many people express a desire to learn more. They just give money," she said. The task force will have tables set up outside the Hatch and on the Campus Center concourse all day today to both accept donations and provide information. The task force offered balloons as an incentive for people to donate.

The money, given to Oxfam is about $1.16 per student, Stockford said. The remainder of the $4.50 dinner fee pays for labor and overhead. "Amherst College gives about $3.00 for each meal and most other schools contribute between $2.00 and $4.00," Stockford said.

Students who can afford to skip one dining common meal can pick up an Oxfam Rebate Card at the dining commons or at one of the task force tables before noon. Students then fill out the cards and give them to the cashier. In order for the money to go to Oxfam, the student cannot eat in the commons tonight regardless of any extra meals they have.

"Although individual contributions may be small, as a whole the university contribution is enormous," Stockford said.

Dead Filipino a victim of state violence

Filipino Cesar Climaro, opponent of President Ferdinand Marcos, was killed Wednesday.

By ARNOLD ZEITLIN
AP Writer

BOSTON Philippine President Ferdinand E. Marcos's vow to catch the killer of Zamboanga Mayor Cesar Climaco recalls the day in 1974 when I arrived at Zamboanga airport, and Climaco bounded to the gate to meet me.

"You've heard about the shooting?" he cried ebulliently.

A bitter opponent of Marcos, Climaco had vowed not to cut his hair until the lifting of martial law. He wore his hear, then at least 18 months since it had been cut, in a pigtail bound by a rubber band behind his neck.

He apparently still wore the pigtail when an unidentified gunman shot a .45 caliber bullet in the back of neck yesterday morning.

I hadn't heard about the shooting. I told Climaco then. I had come to Zamboanga to cover four foreign ministers from Moslem countries touring the area to investigate the Philippine Moslem rebellion in that predominantly Moslem region.

Climaco explained.

The day before, two drunken Philippine Army soldiers had staggered through the center of town about noon firing their automatic Armolite rifles into the air.

A teen age Chinese girl had stepped out on the fourth story baleony of their flat over their shop. Bullets had struck and killed her.

The soldiers fled, Climaco said, outraged. The military, he claimed, refused to search for them.

Climaco wanted the story to go out to the world. With a "no comment" on the death from military authorities in Zamboanga, it did.

Hong Kong papers displayed it on their front pages.

The nest day, 540 miles north in Manila, Primitivo Mijares, then the press spokesman for President Marcos, stormed into the office of The Associated Press. He carried a statement he said was from the president himself. The killers would be apprehended and punished, he said.

The government never again mentioned the death. Periodic inquiry about the progress of the search for the killer never produced an answer.

Study aids waste plan

Pesticides, antifreeze, paint thinner called toxic

By PHIL SERAFINO
Collegian Staff

A recent study conducted by a University of Massachusetts profesor on hazardous waste in Massachusetts homes will enable the state Department of Environmental Quality Engineering to formulate a plan on how to eliminate such wastes.

The data revealed that few people are aware of the connection between indiscriminate dumping of waste and pollution of groundwater, or that many common household products are highly toxic. "It may be a matter of the need for more education," said Dr. Cleve Willis of the agricultural and resource economics department.

Willis conducted a telephone poll of 520 Massachusetts households to determine the types and quantities of hazardous chemicals people have, how they are disposed, and whether residents made sure of safe disposal.

The DEQE will use the information to propose legislation that deals with hazardous waste in homes, because "there is no state or federal legislation to cover household levels of hazardous waste," Willis said. "People simply don't know what to do with it."

According to Willis, many towns sponsor collection days, where people voluntarily bring pesticides, antifreeze, or paint thinner to a designated site so that it may be disposed of properly.

He said that while Massachusetts has been the most responsive state in such programs, towns and private groups do not have enough money to deal with the problem.

Willis said he will consider factors such as environmental impact, economics, likely participation by households, and feasibility of its enforcement in the recommendation to the legislature.

Willis' study received funding from the DEQE through the University's Environmental Institute, a six-month old program that serves as a liaison on environmental research between the state and UMass professors. Willis said that the institute wants to make the University a more effective research facility for the state.

"The state has often paid exorbitant overhead to private consultants," Willis said, noting that agencies such as DEQE were not aware of the tremendous resources available at UMass.

Man hits truck with bookbag

A UMass employee suffered cuts to his forehead Tuesday morning when a man swung a bookbag into the driver's side window of the grounds crew truck the employee was driving, University of Massachusetts police reported.

According to police, the grounds crew truck was behind a car that stopped in the middle of Stockbridge Road for two minutes. When the truck's driver beeped his horn, the man in the parked car approached the truck and smashed his bookbag through the window.

Broken glass from the shattered window cut the driver's forehead.

Police said they have information that should result in the identification of the man. The police said the suspect may be charged with malicious destruction and assault and battery.

A Ford pickup, containing $1,000 worth of carpentry tools, was stolen Tuesday from parking lot 25 near the Physical Plant.

A set of speakers, a power booster, and 40 cassette tapes, worth $550 altogether, were reported stolen from a car Tuesday in lot 25.

A 19-year-old UMass student was arrested and charged with driving while intoxicated and failure to use care in backing out onto the Fearing Street Extension at 2:16 a.m. Wednesday.

Professor works movie magic with Salem trials

By John Williams
Collegian Correspondent

A University of Massachusetts history professor has added a new dimension to his career -- movie making.

Professor Stephen Nissenbaum finished advising for the Public Broadcasting Service film "Three Sovereigns for Sarah," a three-hour production about life in 17th-century Salem and the effect witch trials had on the town. The movie, filmed outside of Boston, stars Vanessa Redgrave as Sarah Cloyce, the only one of three sisters not put to death for practicing witchcraft.

"It was personally exhilirating to see the effect of my work coming alive right before the camera," Nissenbaum said. "Usually professors don't see the immediate impact of what they teach," he said. "But it's a little different to see 70 people in costume taking your suggestions."

> "Usually professors don't see the immediate impact of what they teach. But it's a little different to see 70 people in costume taking your suggestions."
> —Professor Stephen Nissenbaum

Nissenbaum landed the job after the film's producer and scripwriter Victor Pisano read the book "Salem Possessed," written by Nissenbaum and former UMass history professor Paul S. Boyer.

Nissenbaum first became interested in the Salem witch hunts when he taught a course about them in 1969, a year after he came to the University. The history department offers courses on particular events so "students can become more active and get more control" in studying it, according to Nissenbaum.

While teaching the course on Salem, Nissenbaum and his students discovered more sources of information about the trials like tax and property records. He and his colleague, Boyer, got together and wrote their trial citing many of the students in the footnotes.

The book, published in 1974, received the John H. Dunning Prize of the American Historical Association.

The highlight of his experiences, according to Nissenbaum, was the actual filming of "Three Sovereigns for Sarah." Nissenbaum, who is on sabbatical this year, was on the set every day during the six weeks of filming.

"It was lucky for me that I was on leave," Nissenbaum, who had planned the sabbatical last year to get a break from teaching, said. "I would have been involved with the project anyways but, for me, the filming was the payoff."

SGA creates advisory board to air disputes over X-fillms

By BOB BURGESS
Collegian Staff

The Undergraduate Student Senate last night approved the creation of a Student Advisory Film Board for fielding objections to X-rated movies shown on campus.

The board will be comprised of one member from each of the following SGA committees: women's caucus, Third World Caucus, Jewish Caucus, senate, and from all six area governments.

All board members will be trained by professional arbitrators from the Everywoman's Center.

According to bill sponsor Marjorie Boone, the new review board approved 40-12 by senators, will act as a "buffer" between RSOs and objecting students. It will attempt to "raise consciousness" of the two opposing parties.

"We're not trying to take any rights away from students, because the board is only a means for students to vent their opposition to movies shown by RSOs. The board will then work with the both groups for a solution. It's an educational process, above all else," Boone said.

Governmental Affairs chairman Joel Rabinowitz proposed that because the board would have no power to make decisions, a suggestion box for students objecting to movie be used instead.

This met with opposition from many senators because a letter submitted in the box would not have the same effect as students sitting before a board and airing their complaints.

Women's Leadership Project member Liisa Trocki asked if Rabinowitz thought "that a box is more responsive to this issue than people."

Southwest senator Jordan Rosner sided with Rabinowitz. "It seems to me that this board would take the side of the person complaining rather than remain neutral in the RSO, student dispute," he said.

House funds education plan

BOSTON (AP)— The Massachusetts House voted yesterday to dedicate one penny out of every nickel in the state sales tax revenue to finance a proposed four-year, $566 million bill that would impose tougher standards and upgrade facilities at public schools across the state.

The lawmakers voted 125-24 in favor of an amendment that would earmark 20 percent of the 5 percent sales tax—an estimated $265 million a year—to pay for the education plan. They then continued debate on other parts of the plan.

House Republican Leader William Robinson of Melrose, who proposed the amendment, said he had many objections to the overall bill, but wanted to be sure it could be funded without resorting to a state tax increase.

Rep. James Collins, (D-Amherst) one of the architects of the comprehensive proposal to revamp public education in the state, urged approval of the bill yesterday, saying it came "at a historic point in the life not only of Massachusetts but in the life of our nation."

A series of measures to improve the status of teachers is one of the proposals: A statewide minimum stating salary of $18,000, tougher teacher certification, loan forgiveness for college graduates who enter teaching and changes in tenure practices.

Papers donated to Smith

By PAULA JABLONER
Collegian Correspondent

A women's history section of the Smith College Library is acquiring the papers of peace activists Frances Crowe and Dr. Helen Caldicott.

Caldicott is an Australian physician who is part of the nuclear disarmament movement and produced a film called "If You Love This Planet." Crowe is a peace activist who spent a month in jail last spring after spray painting "Thou shall not kill," on the covering of a nuclear missile.

The Sophia Smith Collection is adding the works of Caldicott and Crowe to its women's history archives, the second largest in the country after Radcliffe College.

Virginia Christenson, assistant to the director, said the most widely used papers in the archives are those of Margaret Sanger, founder, leader and propagandist for the international birth control movement. The collection holds half of her papers in addition to many papers from the National Planned Parenthood league.

The collection was initiated by Margaret Storey Geirson, who according to Christenson intended to "document the intellectual and social history of women nationally and internationally."

Christenson said there is still a huge volume of material to be collected. Besides historical material dating as far back as 1790, the collection also receives approximately 83 current women's periodicals many of which are not available elsewhere in the five college area, Christenson said.

In addition oral histories, personal recordings of women's lives, have been added to the collection as well as a video tape of parts of the Equal Rights Campaign.

The aim of the archives is to "acquire, preserve, and make available historical material" for everyone's use, Christenson said.

Film explores Ethiopia's widespread starvation

The widespread starvation occurring in Ethiopia will be the focus of a film sponsored by the Hunger Awareness Committee. There are seven million starving in Ethiopia now, and there has been an international effort made to ship food into the country. The film, "Seeds of Despair," will be shown at 6 p.m. in the Cape Cod Lounge for free.

It's going to be an uphill battle

Any country is in a sad state of affairs when a rational, issue voting human being is not in the mainstream of society. When that country is a major superpower, leader of the free world and the self-proclaimed defender of "democracy," the consequences could prove to be disasterous.

The Reagan administration is claiming a mandate from the people of the United States, a request for the continuation and implementation of existing and future Reagan policies. Let's be real, Ron. With the marginal specific issue voting behavior of the general public, how can you and yours claim a mandate? One can only hope that the Congress realizes this and acts to keep you in check.

Massachusetts, known nationally as the intellectual capital of the United States, chose to offer its electoral college votes to Ronald Reagan, the same Ronald Reagan who denied the many deserving people educational opportunity because of economic hardship. The same Ronald Reagan who referred to the Soviet Union as the "focus of evil in the modern world," and subsequently referred to Massachusetts as a "communist" state. How soon you forget, Massachusetts, how soon you forget.

One bright spot for Massachusetts, however, came with the election of John Kerry to the United States Senate. The presidential coat-tails didn't seem to drag through Massachusettts. However, the decision to vote against a policy of selfishness locally and for a policy of selfishness nationally doesn't make sense, unless Roger Mudd was correct on election night when he said that 60 percent of women voted for Kerry because he "looked like a model." Don't laugh, it happened before. Do Warren Harding and John F. Kennedy sound familiar? Nevertheless, it was a much-needed victory for the Democrats.

As for the Collegian, I'm disappointed with the decision not to endorse the Mondale/Ferraro ticket outright. While anyone who knows the issues knows exactly what candidates they backed, the Board of Editors did not come right out and name them. I believe this was an example of irresponsible journalism. You could have made a difference.

Lastly, I appeal to all Democrats to continue their struggle. Now that the election has been decided, our duty of bringing pertinent issues to the public eye is greater than ever. We have an uphill fight. Let's not have to say "I told you so." Let's reach the top.

Thomas J. Walsh Jr.
Sunderland

Arms and the state are one

General Robert C. Richardson, one of the foremost advocates of High Frontier Weaponry, ("star wars"), lectured Tuesday night on the many advantages this new defensive system, proposed by Ronald Reagan, would have for the United States, and all "free people" everywhere. After describing in some detail this "answer" to the nuclear threat (satellites firing non-nuclear weapons at launched Soviet missiles and destroying them), the General elaborated on time (about five to eight years to complete), and costs (about $26 billion). When he finished presenting this fairly developed star wars scenario, which would in fact become a direct threat to the Soviet Union, perhaps causing them to retaliate and putting the lives of the people of the world, not just the U.S., in danger, he said that after it has been implemented, the U.S. would propose to congenially meet with the Soviet Union to discuss nuclear reduction.

"If someone can be so foolish as to propose such an elaborate and thoroughly planned ultra-modern defense system as star wars, and then assurdly think that the Soviets will merrily come to the table to negotiate, then why can't that same person be so enlightened to propose to sit down at the table before they endanger humankind any more with these plans, and to talk, not about weapons, wars, and treaties, but of beyond-war, beyond-politics, beyond-culture ideas?" I asked him.

"Well, ah, leave that to the politicians," he said in reply.

Doesn't the General know there is no such thing as the separation of military and state?

OPINION

The opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the university unless otherwise noted.

Education before action

Stephen C. Erickson

Since this week is South African "education" week here at UMass, it is hoped that this column might contribute to this educational effort by addressing the issues surrounding South Africa in relation to the investment of U.S. companies in that country. Apartheid is an indefensible, repugnant social system based on the subjugation of non-whites in South Africa and ought to be considered immoral and unjust. That said, let us look at the most prudent means of effecting peaceful change in South Africa.

In recent months there has been much talk around our University about divestment in South Africa. Many people seem to be up in arms regarding this university's investment in stocks of U.S. companies that do business in South Africa. They see divestment as a means to achieving social justice in that country, assuming that U.S. companies are detrimental to reform in South Africa. The fact is, however, that U.S. companies in South Africa are, for the most part, actively promoting the advancement of people of color in that nation.

Seventy-four percent of all U.S. companies doing business in South Africa are signatories of the Sullivan Code, which means they have agreed to, and have largely complied with, regulations which strive to raise up non-whites economically, educationally, and socially. U.S. companies in South Africa have generally desegregated the workplace, provided equal pay for equal work and experience, funded the training and education of Black employees, increased the number of non-whites in management and supervisory positions, and, in many cases, improved the quality of employee life outside the work-place in the areas of housing, transportation, schooling, and recreation. U.S. companies are working against apartheid, not for it.

Moreover, it seems that Black South Africans also believe that U.S. companies ought to remain. A recent poll by eminent sociologist Lawrence Schlemmer shows that 75 percent of Black South African workers disagreed with campaigns in the U.S. to divest in South Africa, for they see the presence of U.S. companies as being in their interests. The standard of living in South Africa, even for Blacks, is higher than in any other African nation. Although no doubt dissatisfied with the political establishment of South Africa, Black South Africans seem to place their livelihood first.

The question still remains as to how Americans can encourage positive social change in South Africa. Violence must be avoided. Given the size of the South African military, a revolution would consist of mass slaughter. Instead, we must encourage reform by leading by example. As opposed to isolating South Africa, the United States should encourage interaction between the two countries. Although limited to white suffrage, and therefore far from democratic, the South African government is still an elected one, and just as our country has been overcoming racism through social awareness, so it must be with South Africa. The more Americans that interact with South Africans, the more we can raise the white South African consciousness. Isolating South Africa can only encourage intransigence and violence.

If the U.S. were to cut off trade with South Africa, would we not be compelled to cut off trade with all oppresive governments? That would leave very few countries with which to trade. It even seems strange that South Africa should head our list of brutal oppressors. The Soviet Union controls every aspect of its society, threatens the world with nuclear annihilation, and exports terrorism through its surrogates. Yet U.S. trade with the Soviet Union is greater than that with South Africa: where is the move to divest in the Soviet Union? From a strictly pragmatic view, the U.S. cannot afford to lose South Africa as a trading partner, for there are minerals in that country which cannot be found elsewhere that are vital to U.S. industry.

Divestment is like throwing the baby out with the bathwater. It strengthens apartheid while discouraging peaceful change. South African Blacks oppose divestment. In terms of U.S. foreign policy, divestment in South Africa alone is inconsistent. The SGA Student Senate, along with other appropriate bodies, ought to give the matter of divestment serious consideration, by really educating itself before acting.

Going 'cold turkey'

William J. Spain

I have one hell of a hangover. The binge I was on for months finally ended last week. Harsh realities are now beginning to sink in. There will be no more elections for a while. I will have to get off politics by the cold-turkey method. No longer will I be able to get away with voicing my opinions in a loud and obnoxious manner in public places. We Americans, showing our usual wisdom and taste, have spoken. I must now resign myself to the fact that Ronnie and his coaching staff get to play first-string for another term.

Anyway, it will be good to put a lot of that crap behind us. People have always been more important than politics. One of the greatest things about America is that we rarely kill each other for strictly political reasons. Here, people only get blown away for good reasons like greed and jealousy. If we can keep on averting full-scale race war, I think we will pull through o.k.

Seriously, I am writing this because there is something on which it is crucially important all factions get together on. It is way past time that environmental protection be removed from partisan fighting. It is everyone's concern. All of you, whether liberal or conservative, are aware of the Reagan administration's shameful record in this area. This should be of particular concern to any Republicans in the reading audience. I doubt that you all want your party to be known to future generations as the one that sold off the last of our wilderness to big corporations.

Please folks, let's get to work on this as a group. Disagreements on the economy and Central America are all very fine but we are all going to need clean air and water in the future. Even though this is not an issue that many people vote on, it would be a grave error not to realize that it concerns us all very deeply. I strongly urge that those of you who have an "in" with this administration to put the pressure on.

Some very scary things have happened in the last four years. Funding for the clean air program was cut by 44 percent. Timber from our national forests has been sold at losses that add up to hundreds of millions. Out of 2,000 toxic waste dumps targeted for cleanup with Superfund money, only six have been done. The ban on commercial trappings of endangered wolves was lifted. Regulations dealing with safety in nuclear power plants have been weakened while the multi-billion dollar subsidies to their operators have increased. Reagan appointees at the U.S. Department of the Interior and the EPA have proved to be staunch supporters of polluters and other ecological rapists. What rocks did all these people crawl out from under?

I have to wonder what the next four years will bring. Will the Reagan administration finally eradicate those pesky pollution-causing trees? Are we going to take care of endangered species by extinction rather than protection? Is Nancy going to buy a black-footed ferret coat? Do we start strip-mining the Grand Tetons? Will we only be able to get acid when it rains? If you answered yes to any of the above questions, you deserve to choke to death on your next spoonful of fried snail-darters.

Letters to the Editor

Seeing Communist aggression realistically

I am writing in response to Stuart Gottlieb's letter in the Collegian Tuesday. I, too, love the United States. However, I do not naively support every foreign policy move the U.S. and the Reagan administration make. I remember hearing of the U.S. invasion of Grenada in 1983 and then feeling angry and frustrated to know that my country was guilty of a blatant violation of international law. I also recall the nauseating slaughter of American marines in Lebanon. Reagan's attempt at a military solution to a political and religious problem brought us that tragedy.

I recognize communist aggression. Communism is a threat throughout Central America, and in Nicaragua in particular. Immediate steps must be taken in order to be sure that the Sandinistas don't become Soviet pawns. Mining Nicaraguan harbors is not the answer. Social and political stability is essential if democratic progress is to be made in Nicaragua. Therefore, outright resistance to a popular people's movement cannot bring "world democracy." By opposing the Sandinistas, Reagan only forces them away from the "free world" and into the laps of the eager USSR.

According to Gottlieb, "If people don't see the world for what it is, and what the USA does for world democracy, then they should keep their thoughts to themselves." I agree. I plainly see what the U.S. does for world democracy. The U.S. opposes the legally elected Sandinista government. (Recall the election results of November 4, 1984 in Nicaragua.) Is this in pursuit of world democracy? "Emperor" Reagan still supports the discriminatory, iron-fisted white rulers of South Africa. Is this also in pursuit of world democracy?

Think with your eyes open to the communist aggression; see also the plight of the Nicaraguans in their true pursuit of self-government. Thank you.

Give us a chance to learn about the issues

Being a student at the University of Massachusetts gives one a grand opportunity to become aware of the political/social issues of the day. This is the thrust of much of the media and speech material presented on the campus. However like many students I am only beginning to exercise curiosity, and feel the weight and importance in dealing with "the issues."

I write this letter because yesterday I went over to a table on the Campus Concourse displaying articles on the U.S./Nicaraguan relationship. Instead of getting helpful, friendly information, I was basically ignored. The young man attending the table looked me over, shoved a pamphlet in my face and resumed political conversation with someone obviously better informed than I. I wondered why that table was there. Were they trying to reach out to passersby with needed information or were they merely displaying paperwork advertising radical elitist views.

Though I strongly believe in the morality of the radical movements on this campus, I often take offense at the pompous arrogant way that I receive information i.e.: you should know this; you, of course, are aware of this aren't you, for if not, you are obviously a backward, capitalist, American, run-of-the-mill moron. I am not. I feel this attitude hurts the effort of teaching the general public issues that they should know.

It also comes to my attention that pam-phlets are not a very good way of presenting information. Unless people already feel something for the issue talked about, the material is generally overlooked or tossed. People need to talk to people.

It would do well for those people who feel informed to learn patience, tolerance and love for common people which they profess they already have. They must find effective, non-threatening ways of teaching, otherwise important messages might be lost to offended ears.

People must be given the time to explore issues for themselves. Certainly it is every citizen's responsibility to learn. But for those who already do possess knowledge, it is now your responsibility to "condescend" to teach.

Field's new film flies

PLACES IN THE HEART
Directed by Robert Benton
Starring Sally Field
at Hampshire Four Cinemas

By ELAINE SENAY
Collegian Staff

Director Robert Benton creates a loving remembrance of the American plains with his latest film Places in the Heart. Sally Field gives a fine performance as Edna Spaulding, a woman who is able to overcome the difficulties of living during the Great Depression.

Field is not rehashing her Oscar-winning performance as Norma Rae. This is a film about fighting the system, 1930's style. Edna is not a woman of this decade; the manner in which she overcomes the racism and sexism around her is different. Edna is not a crusader like Norma Rae. Instead she is a woman who has realized that she must challenge her little part of the universe.

Edna's husband dies in a shooting accident and she is left with two children to support. There is a farm to run and the bank is threatening foreclosure. She is overwhelmed by her situation and its implications.

Although Places in the Heart is tinged with sentiment, the harsh realities of life are presented matter-of-factly and not sensationally. As Benton builds around Field, he develops the sub-plots which give viewers a sense of what life was like in Texas during the 1930s.

Edna's mentor is a black hobo named Moze played by Danny Glover. Moze shows her how to plant cotton as well as how to deal with the good ol' boys in the cotton trade. Edna finds the strength she needs and quietly her own will to survive emerges. The realization is not sudden; Benton nurtures it through a series of ordinary yet humorous events.

Places in the Heart is a great movie because it does not romanticize or patronize its characters. The supporting cast is ideal and could not be improved. Edna's blind boarder is played by John Malkovich. He, like many other characters is swept up by her warmth and is able to overcome his self-pity. Yankton Hatten and Gennie James are naturals as Edna's children, Frank and Possum.

Dr. Fred Tillis (above) will be featured in a free jazz concert at the Tavern at the Lord Jeffrey Inn on Monday, November 19 at 9:30 p.m. Saxophonist Tillis, who is director of both the UMass Fine Arts Center and the Afro-American Music Program, will perform with bassist Ed Jones as a part of the jazz series held at the Tavern.

Hardcore from the heartland

By ELIZABETH C. LANGLOIS
Collegian Correspondent

Husker Du, hailing from Minneapolis, is one of the most exciting bands around right now. This past summer, they released Zen Arcade, a "white album" of sorts, and the first double album ever released by a hardcore band, following hard on the heels of their wonderful cover of "Eight Miles High." Zen Arcade is an amazing album, full of twists and turns, and some not so surprising results. 23 songs were recorded and mixed in 85 hours, most in one take. This wasn't so amazing twenty years ago, but in today's times of Overdub City, it's pretty incredible, as are the results of this marathon venture.

The songs center around one disillusioned guy, in "Something I Learned Today", looking out on a gray and very banal world. He splits with his girlfriend and takes off in "Chartered Trips." He wanders around, gets involved with Hare Krishnas, decides that's not the meaning of life, then decides the same thing about the military. Our hero tries his hand at playing in a band because he thinks it's all glamour, and finds out he better wake up and face reality, "The Biggest Lie." He returns home, his girlfriend commits suicide, and he works at a computer firm. He finally literally wakes up, discovers he's been dreaming, and returns to school the next day.

OK, so what about the music? The style shifting on side one alone will keep guessing. What Husker Du is up to is a very definite move away from hardcore. But don't let that disillusion any headbangers. Side two is pure adrenalin rush from start to finish with some very angry, biting sentiments, especially the resentment pouring from "I'll Never Forget You." You can be sure the person won't be remembered in the kindest terms.

Most of side four is taken up by the fourteen minute opus, "Reoccurring Dreams." It is white noice at its finest, with enough guitar thrash to sate anyone's appetite. One of the real standouts on the album is "Turn on the News" which basically repeats what everbody already knows that violence is everywhere, the media is shoving it at us, and it's obstructing us from the important thing, caring about our fellow man.

Husker Du has a real penchant for psychedelia. The best example of this is the highly melodic, fuzzed out "Pink Turns to Blue", probably the best track on the album. This talent also appears in the form of reversed tape loops, "The Tooth Fairy" and the backwards "Dream Reoccurring", and the funny mystic chanting in "Hare Krisna." Husker Du turned up the juice a bit for the powerful "Chartered Trips", with some real killer hooks. There is also the melancholy, acoustic number "Never Talking to You Again."

This is definitely a band in search of a more diverse style. Their new sound is a far cry from earlier efforts. Bob Mould, guitarist and main spokesman for the band, has indicated that the band never intended to stay with hardcore. It was just a stepping stone, and not something the band wants to have associated with them permanently. With this effort, Mould and Co. don't have to worry about that.

There is a vein of melody underlying every song on this record, even the hardest ones. The songs are brilliant, short pastiches of highly personal feelings, strung together coherently in a song cycle, making this a concept album of sorts. Zen Arcade is a very positive step in the right direction, and promises great things for this band from Minnesota.

Depleted UM wrestlers regroup one last time

Hartford final home opponent

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

Last May, as word got around Boyden Building that seven varsity sports were being demoted to club level, unwarned wrestling coach Rick Freitas was sitting in his office offering a recuit the chance to compete for one of New England's better teams.

The University of Massachusetts had placed four wrestlers in the national championships last February, more than any other team in the region. The incoming freshman class was projected as one of the strongest in Minuteman history. UMass wrestling was ready to challenge Freitas' goal of reaching the top 20 in Division I nationally.

Now, in a small office away from the other coaches, missing two of those New England champs who quit the team in disgust and hearing the complaints of freshmen parents who believe their children were misled, Freitas still wonders what happened.

"I really wish I could understand why, but I can't," Freitas said in an interview yesterday. "Sure, our duel meet record (1-16) wasn't good. But wrestling is judged by how individuals do. We placed four kids in the nationals. Some people think we have a good program"

Freitas will be gone next season after his contract expires, off to a new school and a new team, and 15-20 wrestlers will be without a sport. You can't compete on a club level without a coach against well-coached players who can practice daily.

Freitas has a desk drawer full of letters from high school and college coaches, parents and others concerned about the demise of wrestling at UMass. Petitions with thousands of signatures have gone to no avail.

"I think they (the athletic department administrators) don't realize what we could have. I think we could've been good, we have a young team and in two years we would have been among the best in the country, top 20 and all. You look at men's sports here and we're the only ones to have competed nationally last season. It's senseless."

As for this season, most eyes will be on sophomore Chris Lee, a 126 pounder who is ranked tenth in the nation by the NCAA.

Lee was named to the Wrestling News all freshman team and won the New England title in his class. He joins Tom Beeri (118), Tom Piccirillo (150) and Tom Pomella (190) as standouts on this year's team. The later three are highly-reeruited freshmen along with heavyweight Dan White.

The Minutemen will have their only home duel meet of the season on Saturday at 7 p.m. in Boyden against the University of Hartford.

"We'll stay in there, give it our best and that will be it," Freitas said. "After that, it's all gone."

Olympians in boxing debut Breland, others to fight in NY

Profitable careers start with giveaway

NEW YORK (AP) Six Olympic boxing medalists, including welterweight Mark Breland and heavyweight Tyrell Biggs, will be given a coming out party Friday night at Madison Square Garden.

They will turn pro before a free packed house of 21,000. To obtain tickets, written requests had to be made to the New York Daily News. There was a limit of four tickets per request.

The giveaway was the idea of Breland, who grew up in Brooklyn's Bedford Stuyvesant section. "After all the years I've been fighting at Madison Square Garden, I felt I owed the fans something," said Breland, who won five New York Golden Gloves titles in the Garden.

The other Olympians are lightweight Pernell Whitaker and featherweight Meldrick Taylor, gold medalists, as were Breland and Biggs; light heavyweight Evander Holyfield, a bronze medalist, and middleweight Virgil Hill, a silver medalist.

Breland's purse is tops at $100,000, while Taylor gets $50,000. The other three will get $75,000 each. The opponents are getting between $3,500 and $5,000.

Breland will be in the featured final bout against Dwight Williams of Syracuse, N.Y., who has a 7-1 pro record, with two knockouts. The 21 year-old Breland, who is 6 foot 2½, had a 110-1 record, with 73 knockouts, and also won a world championship.

Holyfield, 22, of Atlanta, 160-14, with 75 knockouts, will box Lionel Byarm of Philadelphia, 9-1-2, with four knockouts. Holyfield was the subject of an Olympic controversy when he was disqualified in the semi finals after knocking down his opponent with what the referee ruled was an illegal blow.

Taylor, 18, of Philadelphia, will fight Luke Leece of Pittsburgh, who is 14-2-1, with eight knockouts. Taylor, who was 99-4, with 32 knockouts, won his Olympic gold medal as a featherweight.

Biggs, 22, of Philadelphia, 108-6, with 41 knockouts, will fight Mike Evans, 25; of Los Angeles, 3-1-1, with one knockout. Biggs was the super heavyweight champion at the Olympics, while Henry Tillman of Los Angeles was the heavyweight champion 201-pound limit.

Whitaker, 20, of Norfolk, Va., 201-13, with 91 knockouts, will fight Farrain Comeaux, 23, of Nederland, Texas, 10-0, with six knockouts.

Taylor's fight will be taped for viewing on the telecast, while Breland, Biggs, Whitaker and Holyfield will be seen live.

Just a few thoughts...

It's too bad I missed that ten-round, light heavyweight fight at the Boston Garden on Friday. Larry Bird had already hit for 42 points early in the third quarter when all of a sudden he starts going at it with Julius Erving. Both were levied fines of $7,500, and they were fortunate that they didn't get suspended.... What struck me strange on the replay was that it looked like Bird may have instigated it. Even more frightening to see was Moses Malone holding Bird while Erving was hitting him. I'm looking forward to the installation of penalty boxes at courtside with Moses getting five minutes for being the third man in.

It really is hard to believe that both players would be embroiled in a fight with each other, as both have been the class of basketball for years. I wonder what the next Converse commercial will include with these two. It looks like another Steinbrenner-Martin duo...All the other hoop news centers around one man-Michael Jordan. I saw videotape of him against the Knicks last week and, if you get a chance, don't miss him. Some of his jams are breathtaking (9.8's and 9.9's--he would have gotten a 10, but the East German judge was tough)...He is bound to be the most exciting player in basketball. He might even make Tommy Newsome smile.

College hoop is just around the corner, and Georgetown is the overwhelming choice to repeat. Ewing will probably have a better year than last year, and John Thompson is proving to be a tough, stern, yet successful coach...Remember Michael Graham last year, the big freshman who looked like a young Yul Brenner? Well, Thompson has him sitting out this year, the entire year, for academic reasons. It looks like Mike didn't get the old GPA up. I guess The History of Sneakers is tougher than people make it out to be.

It is really strange to see North Carolina and UCLA not make the top 20. But mark my words, Dean Smith will be there come playoff time...I saw former UMass nemesis Terence Stansbury play for the Indiana Pacers early this week. The guard out of Temple has the tools to make it in the pros so look for him as well.

The college football poll shows Nebraska now in first, with their big showdown against Oklahoma coming up...Can you believe South Carolina is second in the nation. They should drop a few just because they are called the, of all things, Gamecocks. If that's not bad enough, TCU is tenth, and they are nicknamed the Horned Frogs. If anyone, other than Marlon Perkins, can tell me what either animal is, I would love to know.

No more need be said.

Creativity down at school, work

By LAURA YEE
Collegian Staff

The industrial and academic environment stifle an individual's creativity in ways that threaten the advancement of science and technology, a University of Massachusetts chemical engineering professor said last night in Memorial Hall.

In the second part of the Chancellor's Lecture Series, Vladimir Haensel in his speech, "Creativity and the Future of Science and Technology," told an audience of about 300 that creativity cannot be forced in either the academic or industrial world.

"It (creativity) is like love. If you ask for it, it is not much good," Haensel said. "But what happens when circumstances and societal pressures become so dominant that a proven positive person feels that he must perform?"

Haensel cited "one of the greatest composers" in stressing his point that "creativity cannot be forced." He said Shostakovich, "a musical genius," wrote "horrible music on demand by the Soviet government."

Haensel, who was president and director of Universal Oil Products Company for 20 of his 40 years there before coming to UMass in 1980, creativity must be nurtured, "but first must be ignited. Once ignited, it will result in a continuous thought process which attempts to exclude all inferences until it culminates in either success or failure."

Haensel said that academia and industry are stifling creativity because they are afraid of "failure, and making a fool of oneself."

Haensel said management also stifles creativity by programming individuals like "pavlov dogs" to always consult it before taking action, which prevents spontaneity and creativity.

"This continuing contact," he said, "is a most serious threat to innovation."

Haensel: "All I ask for is to give creativity a chance."

It is only a matter of time "before research managers begin to spend their working hours trying to avoid risk, to stay out of trouble and to manage their existing assets more efficiently instead of concentrating on creating an environment where the troublesome and wavering lamp of the inventor can grow more brightly," he said.

Haensel recommends that a creative person look to the entrepreneur in a research corporation who can "do more to overcome the objections of the cautious middle managers who are so afraid of failure."

Haensel, who has written hundreds of scientific and technical papers, said industry and univeristies need to "provide a proper climate so that more and more people can be creative."

"University-industry linkages will be successful only if they are based on educational programs of intrinsic academic value," he said.

TSONGAS OPENS SEMINAR

• Industry reps review studies

By LARRY BOUCHIE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts departments of electrical computer engineering and computer and information science (COINS) yesterday welcomed about 150 New England industry representatives to the 1984 Research Review.

The purpose of the two-day conference is to solicit unrestricted corporate donations and to attract attention to research conducted at the University that may be applicable to regional businesses.

Chancellor Joseph D. Duffy opened the conference, saying that the University must realize its educational role in the improvement of this country's ability to compete technologically worldwide.

Provost Richard O'Brien agreed. "Particularly, we are pledged to growth in this graduate area." He said the University's first priority is the development of graduate research.

Edward Riseman, head of the COINS department, further outlined the purpose of the conference by unveiling a proposed Computer Research Institute, which would function as "an umbrella institute for COINS scientists and ECE engineers."

The institute funded by unrestricted $10,000 annual corporate donations or $20,000 partially restricted donations, and Riseman said he hoped that about 20 to 30 corporations would participate.

"We have quite a large amount of research funding, what we don't have is flexible funds," Riseman said. "Our equipment needs are almost identical for education and research.

• New economic plan needed

By LARRY BOUCHIE
Collegian Staff

The Democratic Party must adopt a new economic platform in order to attract more voters, U.S. Sen. Paul Tsongas (D-Mass.) said yesterday at the University of Massachusetts.

Tsongas was the featured speaker for the 1984 Research Review, a two-day conference organized by the departments of electrical and computer engineering and computer and information science. The conference showcased research conducted at the University to about 150 New England regional industry representatives.

"The Democratic party has to appeal to the middle class. It's that simple," Tsongas said.

Tsongas: "The Democratic party has to appeal to the middle class."

The most effective way of doing so, he said, is to confront the deficit with either balanced budget or a budget freeze, which Tsongas favors.

"People believe that the Democratic party doesn't know anything or care anything about economies. They feel we're anti-business," he said. "The reason they feel that is because we are. And that has to change."

Tsongas said that although President Reagan has supported a balanced budget amendment, Reagan has never submitted a balanced budget.

"If you're for one, produce one," Tsongas said.

Instead of a balanced budget, Tsongas said the solution for a growing deficit is a budget freeze. Tsongas siad that every Democratic senator who voted for the budget freeze and ran for re-election was re-elected last week.

Kidnapped Pawtucket baby found dead behind building

PAWTUCKET, R.I. — The body of missing 4-month-old Jerri Ann Richard was found late yesterday afternoon by two maintenance men behind a building in the city, police Capt. Carl A. Benson said.

The body was found at the end of a long day in which Richard and his wife, Donna, appeared on several New England television broadcasts to make a desperate plea for help in the weekend kidnapping.

The little girl was snatched from her crib sometime early Sunday morning as her parents slept in another bedroom must 10 feet away, police said in earlier reports.

Baby Fae's heart fails

LOMA LINDA, Calif — Baby Fae, the infant who received a baboon's heart to replace her own congenitally deformed one, died at 9 p.m. last night, a Loma Linda University Medical Center spokesman said.

"Baby Fae died at 9 p.m.," said Ed Wines, vice president for public relations and development for the university, reading from a statement issued by doctors.

Baby Fae, whose identity has not been revealed by Loma Linda authorities, had been listed in serious but stable condition earlier yesterday, ending her third week with the walnut sized simian heart.

She struggled back from a rejection episode which peaked Monday and weakened the heart's pumping abilities, said spokeswoman Joyce McClintock at Loma Linda University Medical Center. The five-pound infant had been on a respirator and was being fed intraveneously.

Lebanese military presents demands

NAQOURA, Lebanon (AP) — Lebanese negotiators yesterday demanded a quick and complete withdrawal of Israeli troops from south Lebanon and payment of $8 billion to $10 billion in war reparations by the Jewish state.

The Lebanese military delegations presented a long list of tough demands in the second round of negotiations with Israeli officers at the headquarters of the United Nations peacekeeping force.

Israel is concerned with the security of its northern border if the troops are pulled back. Almost every point the Lebanese raised on the future of southern Lebanon conflicted with Israel's previously stated positions.

Conference sources said Israel rejected the Lebanese declaration and asked instead for a detailed Lebanese plan on security arrangements following an Israeli withdrawal from the country it invaded 2¼ years ago.

The Lebanese agreed to continue discussions of the security issue when the talks resume Monday in this border town, according to the sources who spoke on condition they not be identified.

The Lebanese demands, read by chief delegate Brig. Gen. Mohammed Hajj, included denunciations of Israel's occupation army and accusations that Israel had "strangled liberty and freedom of expression" in southern Lebanon.

Conference sources and the joint closing statement issued after the six-hour session indicated the Israelis refrained from arguing over the Lebanese charges in order to keep the talks from bogging down.

In the statement read by Hajj, Lebanon demanded Israel enact a "complete and quick withdrawal from all Lebanese territory, unconditionally." It spoke of "the eagerness of the Lebanese people to be freed from the big prison in which the Israeli occupation has been strangling them" since the June 6, 1982, invasion.

The Lebanese and Israeli military delegates met under heavy security after a week of wrangling over Israel's arrest of four senior Shiite Moslem militiamen in southern Lebanon. Israel released three of the men Wednesday and promised to release the fourth, militia commander Mahmoud Fakih.

Service to start again for Provincetown airline

NAPLES, Fla. (AP) — Provincetown-Boston Airlines Inc., grounded for safety violations, said yesterday that it should be able to comply with federal regulations and resume service to 17 destinations on Tuesday.

The Naples based carrier was expected to use its smaller aircraft on those routes, and then expand service by Nov. 25 to include all prefious points - some 500 flights to 35 cities, a PBA new release said.

The Federal Aviation Administration "has made available to us seven inspectors on a fulltime basis and an additional five will be arriving to help with the recertification," said Peter Van Arsdale, the carrier's president and chief executive officer.

The regional airline's operating certificate was yanked Saturday after a former pilot complained PBA was not maintaining its fleet properly and that some crew members were not cleared to operate certain aircraft.

UMass graduate, now Vt. governor, remembered

By DEBORAH ROSS

Kunin: The campaign was "very exciting and very rewarding, but very exhausting."

Last week the people of Vermont elected as their governor Madeleine Kunin, who claims the distinction of not only being the first woman governor in Vermont history but also a graduate of the University of Massachusetts.

Kunin, who graduated with a history degree in 1956, recalled in a telephone interview that she "received a very fine education" at UMass during the "relatively quiet period of the 50s."

UMass history professor Louis Greenbaum described his former student, then Madeleine May, as an "utterly enchanting and fine young woman" whose presence is class was "very quiet and retiring.

Greenbaum said Kunin was a student of exceptional quality," who was "serious, scholarly and goal orientated" as well as "committed, devoted and concerned."

"It is these qualities which probably appealed to the electorate of Vermont," he said, even though the odds were stacked against her because she is "a woman, Jewish and a Democrat," he said.

Kunin, who managed to defeat the Republican candidate by a 60-40 margin in a state where President Reagan won with a 19 point margin attributes her success to the fact that she "spoke to the issues the Vermont community cared about, education, environmental policy, and economic growth."

She said the biggest challenge she would have to face in her two-year term would be "to address these issues within the limits of a tight fiscal budget."

Kunin's entry into politics followed a circuitous route. After graduating from UMass she went to the Columbia School of Journalism and then joined the staff of the Burlington Free Press in Vermont.

It was during a visit to Switzerland, where women were struggling to get the vot in 1970 that Kunin rediscovered her long held political ambitions. On her return to Vermont she became politically active and was elected to the Vermont House in 1972.

By 1978, she was lieutenant governor.

Kunin's English professor at UMass, Leon Barron, said he was not "surprised by her success" because she was "very determined and had the qualities of a future leader."

"She frequently led discussions at our literary society meetings," Barron recalled. "She was involved in many things but always managed to keep her grade average high."

At UMass, Kunin was an editor of the Collegian's editorial page, a member of the Operetta Guild, the International Committee, the student senate and the Hillel Foundation, while still managing to make the Dean's list every year.

Greenbaum admits he is "extremely proud of Kunin's success" and described her election last week as an "historic and great day for UMass."

According to John Hite, director of Alumni Affairs, Kunin "is the first alumnus ever to be elected governor."

Kunin, who was busy packing for a holiday in the Virgin Islands when interviewed, described the last two weeks as "very exciting and very rewarding, but very exhausting."

NoHo : an expensive place to live

By RENEE BACHER

Natives of Northampton are being priced out of their homes because of the increase in rents and the high cost of living that have come with the city's growing attractiveness, according to the city's housing planner David Heflich.

Seven panelists discussed their impressions of a changing Northampton in an open meeting of Smith College's urban sociology class, moderated by instructor Richard Fantasia Wednesday evening.

The panelists included Northampton Mayor David Musante, Councilwoman Loise Bart, John Dunne of the Hampshire County Action Commission, William Gillen of the Gillen Partnership, Helen Searning, a Smith College professor of art, Gerald Wallace, tax accountant and landlord, and Heflich.

Searing said when she came to Northampton from New York in 1967, it lacked urbanity. But the opening of Fitzwilly's and Beardsly's restaurants in the mid 1970s, along with Bonducci's Cafe, lent Northampton the charm "which later designated it one of the Main Street U.S.A's," she said.

Heflich indicated that the development in Northampton has experienced gentrifications [illegible] ing the social ladder.

He said the changes have made Northampton visually prettier, but these mean contract rent in Northampton is $255 per month, but Heflich found the mean rent to be $452 a month in actuality.

These prices keep people with a waiver for government subsidized housing at a bare minimum, because housing within their given rent ranges is scarce, if it exists at all, Heflich said.

Sensitive crime unit stresses counseling, care

By JOEL P. COFFIDIS
Collegian Staff

Sensitive crimes such as rape and indecent assault and battery are usually handled by the sensitive crimes unit, a specialized unit within the detective division of the Department of Public Safety at UMass.

Michael Grabiec, the head of the unit said, "We investigate all crimes of a sensitive nature that include rape, sexual harassment, indecent assault and battery and child assault." He added, "It could include verbal assault, but there are a lot of other crimes that could be included."

The sensitive crime unit staff member are specially trained for sensitive crimes.

"The staff has been trained at the Boston School of Nursing and various criminal justice seminars," said Robert G. Joyce, UMass police chief.

"They are trained for counseling, evidence collection and rape protocol," Joyce said.

"Basically there are two full-time people and at least six to eight others who are certified," Grabiec said.

Joyce said the unit is important because a sensitive crime "leaves a definite traumatic effect on the individual and you have to handle it differently."

He said the unit investigated three rape cases last year and 12 sensitive crimes as well as other assault and battery cases with "sexual overtones."

"One of the things that is difficult is to say how many of any of the crimes go unreported," Grabiec said.

One rape has been reported to the unit this semester.

"When a rape is reported, we start an investigation and get help from the Everywoman's Center and other resources available to us," Grabiec said.

"We have rape talks upon request and a system for people whowant to give us rape information," said Grabiec.

Grabiec said the staff is "trained in investigating, prosecution and prevention of rape." He added, "People can give information without revealing their names."

The unit is located at the Department of Public Safety in Dickinson Hall.

"We share jurisdiction with the town. It's a very good working relationship that's beneficial for the entire town of Amherst," said Joyce. "The sensitive crime unit's investigations that involve special handling are available to assist other jurisdictions throughout the area."

Hatch patrons to be served , two waitresses begin Dec. 1

By JOHN VINCENT
Collegian Staff

The Hatch will start having waiters and waitresses serving out of the La Cuchina part of the cafeteria by Dec. 1, Assistant Director of Food Services Larry Jeffers said last night.

Jeffers said the new service will create a low-cost alternative to the Top of the Campus restaurant for dinner dates. Menu items will average around $3.50, which Jeffers said will be $2 to $5 less for a meal for two at the TOC.

Jeffers said he plans to start with two waitresses and a special of the day once a week, along with the regular La Cuchina menu, with a few additions.

In other Campus Center news, Bernard Wilkes, assistant director of the Campus Center, last night told the Campus Center Board of Govenors that students no longer control the day to day operations of the Campus Center because they could not handle the responsibility.

Christos Karastamatis, a BOG member, asked why the board has less power than it did in the 1970s.

Wilkes replied, "They (board members) could not handle it," and he pointed out that the students had some of their "power" because the Campus Center director had to answer to them in the past.

Karastamatis asked Wilkes about his position on listening to student ideas, after Wilkes had said he was interested in student input on future projects but that it was too late for students to influence current decisions.

Wilkes also had his definition of the purpose of the Campus Center challenged by BOG member Evangelos Kechris, who said he felt the Campus Center was primarily to serve students.

Wilkes said the Campus Center should serve the "university community," which he said ranged from students to all of western Massachusetts and the state.

Kechris said he doesn't see how much will be accomplished unless the Board of Governors and the Campus Center Administration realize they are working from two different points; Wilkes said he doesn't see how much will be accomplished on the board until it stops asking for input on current decisions and focuses on the future.

Author speaks on men's role in abortion

By LAURA KOESTER
Collegian Staff

The impact of abortion on men is a "hidden and taboo issue" according to Arthur Shostak, professor of sociology at Drexel University, who spoke to an audience of 40 people last night at Hampshire College.

Shostak, co-author of the new book Men and Abortion: Lessons, Losses and Love, said that men are taught to abide by the rules and that rule surrounding abortion is that men should be "silent and supportive, a strong shoulder. Men feel guilty when they have negative feelings about abortion. I want to take the subject out of the closet."

Shostak emphasized that the ultimate decision of whether or not to have an abortion rests with the woman, but that in order to made the experience less emotionally damaging and less likely to happen again, both the man and the woman must verbalize and deal with their feelings.

"Most of the men in my survey were not honest with the woman. Most had minimal pre-thought before the abortion and 75 percent of them had discussed the abortion with no one but their partner."

Shostak acknowledged that the statisical sample used in his book was "one of convenience versus a scientific one" because it was based on a questionnaire which many abortion clinics, including Planned Parenthood, refused to distribute because of privacy considerations. His sample was based on 30 abortion clinics in 18 states, although "many clinics do not want to touch the issue."

Shostak said that 95 percent of the men in his sample said they were in a serious relationship with the woman involved. On the day of the abortion, only 3 percent felt that the abortion was undermining their relationship. However, 40 percent of the men said they believed life began in the trimesters available for termination of the preganancy.

Shostak pointed out that in both his data and data from a Gallup poll, American men are more pro-choice than American women.

"We are drowning in suspicion, dishonesty, and game-playing. Abortion is a good place to engage the issue of quality coupleness. I want couples to seriously discuss what they would do in the event of an unwanted pregnancy, since no birth control method is 100 percent effective," Shostak said.

Attempted car robbery, violations reported

A 1970 Ford parked in P lot by Alumni Stadium was reported broken into and vandalized at 6:21 p.m. Wednesday, causing $365 in damage.

UMass police said the ignition was ripped out in an attempt to steal the car, but the car's owner had taken the coil wire out, which prevented the theft.

A 21-year-old Ludlow man was arrested and charged with driving while intoxicated at 1:33 a.m. Thursday, when police said they observed him driving across marked lines on Massachusetts Avenue.

A Bianchi 10-speed bicycle, valued at $300, was reported stolen at 2:37 p.m. Wednesday from the north side of the School of Management. Police said the bike was locked to a tree and the lock was cut.

A 36-year-old Easthampton man was arrested by Easthampton police at 11:22 p.m. Wednesday and charged with outstanding motor vehicle warrants issued by the UMass police.

New civility chairman picked

Jay Savereid a professor in the communications studies department has been appointed chairman of the UMass Commission on Civility in Human Relations, University of Massachusetts Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey said yesterday.

Savereid will begin his service at the next meeting, which is yet to be announced. He is replacing zoology professor Vincent Dethier, who has been chairman for the past five years.

Other new members to the commission include faculty and officers of the undergraduate and graduate student senate.

Tsongas also said that regaining a competitive research capability over foreign nations cannot be dependent on government action.

"Most of the progress in terms of long-term competitiveness has to come out of meetings like this, rather than have the government be the leader in the process," he said.

We intend to maintain the educational mission of our departments."

Riseman said corporations should join this Industrial Affiliates Program because it would demonstrate business' support for education, it would better communicate research results, and it would facilitate the recruitment of University students to the job market.

Following the introductory morning conference, those in attendence ate lunch while U.S. Sen. Paul Tsongas, D-Mass., spoke about the need for industry and educational cooperation and about the need for the Democratic party to attract more voters.

The remainder of the conference, which ends today at noon, includes faculty and graduate student presentations of research projects, allowing for access to specific research projects by industry representatives.

Local women join in oppression protest

By DEBORAH NEUBAUER
Collegian Correspondent

About 1,000 women from throughout the United States, including about 200 from the Pioneer Valley, will convene in New York City this weekend to protest the oppression they say is perpetuated by the multi-national corporations on Wall Street.

"Women need to see each other all working together to fight male domination, racism, and corporate oppression perpetuated by the capitalist system," Julie Ogletree, a spokesperson for Not In Our Name, the organization in charge of the Protest, said in a telephone interview yesterday.

About 200 Women from the five-college area are planning to participate in the march and civil disobedience this Sunday and Monday in New York City.

Vans will be leaving at 6 and 7 a.m. Sunday from Amherst Common, and at 8 a.m. from Thornes Market and Mount Holyoke College. Some vans will be returning Sunday night, and some Monday night. There will be a sliding scale fee of $9 to $12, according to one's ability to pay.

The march on Sunday will begin at 59th Street and 5th Avenue near Central Park and will proceed through midtown Manhattan past 11 to 15 major corporations.

Specifically targeted by the march are General Electric, Citicorps, Upjohn, and Harper and Roe, Ogletree said. She estimated that 1,000 women will protest on Sunday, and somewhat fewer on Monday.

"Many women plan to do civil disobedience on Monday. However, the specific nature of the civil disobedience will be determined at Sunday night's meeting," Ogletree said. For women not planning civil disobedience, there will be a solidarity rally across the street from the stock exchange.

Women will be sleeping at various locations in New York City Sunday night, including churches and schools.

Monday's gathering will meet at 7 a.m. at the intersection of Worth and Lafayette streets. The march will proceed through the financial district and will reach the stock exchange at approximately 8:30 a.m.

"Wall Street is targeted for the march of resistance because that is really the heart of the capitalist enterprise," Ogletree said.

Heidi Holland, a UMass student and member of the SCERA women's issues team, said she felt that the time for this type of resistance is now more pressing than ever.

"This action will show them that we don't approve of their actions of exploiting people in this country and abroad," Holland said, in reference to the mult-national corporations targeted by the march.

Radical Student Union member Randi Saslow said "When you compare the women's peace movements here in the United State with those in Europe, we're really not fulfilling our responsibility."

Saslow said thousands of women show up at European demonstrations to "put their bodies on the line." Saslow said there is a special kind of energy that comes through a community of women in an all-women's protest.

Davis suggested a more appropriate mechanism be between the federal government and the state earning institutions, and some form of equity in the public funding guaranteed by the government as to have the same tax base for all school districts.

Davis said teacher's salaries should also be "upgraded across the board" in order to lure competent teachers.

Nieto suggested that training teachers to be more sensitive to the students' social and cultural backgrounds, having a non-racist and non-oppressive atmosphere and involving parents in the school process, would help.

Nieto noted that bilingual education is not the solution to help lower the Hispanic drop out rate, "but it can help."

"It provides an atmosphere that tends to be supportive and allows them (students) to get an education in their native language until they learn English," she said.

Luis Fuentes, assistant professor of education, agrees. He said. "Education is communication: if you can't communicate, you can't educate."

'Life in Fast Lane' returns to UMass

The New World Theater at the University of Massachusetts presents Life in the Fast Lane on Saturday at 8 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium. Written and performed by Japanese Hawaiian poet, Lane Nishikawa, Life in the Fast Lane is a dynamic play about growing up Asian American.

Critics have called it a "one-man tour de force". From the country twang of the good 'ol boy in 'The Bigot', to the street rap of 'The Black Jap', to the pigdin English of 'They Was Close, Those Brothers', to a recollection of foods prepared by his Oba-Chan (grandmother), Nishikawa shares his experiences with the audience.

Produced by Sansei Productions of San Francisco, Life in the Fast Lane returns to Amherst after a successful performance at the University in 1982.

In conjunction with the play, Nishikawa will present a lecture demonstration on Asian American Theater at 2 p.m. on November 17 at Emily Dickinson Hall, Hampshire College. The lecture is free and open to the public.

Tickets for the evening performance are available at the Fine Arts Center Box Office (545 2511) or at the door the night of the performance. Childcare can be provided by phoning 545-0190 one week prior.

Black Affairs

S. African women's movement discussed

By MARANN CASSELL
Collegian Staff

South African women began their struggle against apartheid in 1955 to protest against the mandatory passes, which allows blacks to get from one part of the city to another, according to the film "You Have Struck a Rock," shown last night at the University of Massachusetts.

This lead the African men to realize this was their country and they did not need passes. When the men got together to burn their passes, the South African government saw this as a threat and opened arms on what was to be a peaceful protest, which was shown in the movie last night.

Penny Andrews of the NAACP legal defense fund said, divestment in South Africa was a question she could not answer because she will be returning to South Africa within a year and penalities for speaking out against the government will be five years minimum and maximum is death.

"That is basically the nature of the South African Apartheid system, that is how the labor system work, and that is the kind of hardship that is provoked and that is the kind of issue that women in South Africa are dealing with," she said.

"South Africa is a highly sexist society. It's a very macho society, Andrews said. "We can not even begin to talk about sexism and issues like that because we are dealing with basic human rights issues such as families living together, women acquiring the rights to work where they want and gaining access to travel and just be "a productive means within the society and be full citizens of their country," she said.

Andrews thinks it is important for American women to see how far South Africans have to go in order for them to give support to black women in South Africa. "It is very difficult to separate women issue from the widen political struggle in South Africa," she said. The system is so oppressive, that all black people suffer from it. She said it is very difficult to separate oppression of black women and the oppression of black people, she said.

Films show African struggles, despair

● Ethiopia: striving to survive

By MARANN CASSELL
Collegian Staff

The crisis in Ethiopia estimate that 7-10 million people are seriously short of food and water. 100 people, mostly children are starving to death in northern Ehiopia, according to the film "The Ethiopian Crisis" shown last night at the University of Massachusetts.

The drought 10 years ago, which left 200,000 people dead, is said to be vastly worse then what will happen now if something is not done to control the famine. In southern Ethiopia one theird of the children are suffering from severe malnutrition.

Many villages have been abandoned, and there are about 1.5 million famine victims in Eritrea a refugee town who are trying to survive on wild plants. Disease is rampant, and medical supplies are short.

The coming harvest will be disastrous, because many people have eaten the seeds they would have saved for planting, which threatens their food production. The animals are so malnourished that they are not worth eating, as illustrated through the film.

As pointed out in the film, the people of Ethiopia felt that sharing their cattle with someone else and to be able to produce more, were most important to them. When Oxfam went into Ethiopia they loaned about 100 cattle to the villages. When they were able to produce more they would pass it on to others, in that since we strive for long term plans without disturbing their cultural values, said Maggie White, Boston area OXFAM Coordinator.

In 1974, Ethiopia's government was overthrown and one was installed. Because of political ties with the Soviet Union the United States had refused to give any kind of support, she said. But, when the BBC released their film about the famine in Ethiopia, the CBS netword obtained a copy and aired it on national television. When the American public saw this 50 percent pressured the government to help contribute to the famine in Ethiopia. "This has certainly given me hope in my fellow Americans," she said.

"Through the cash crop, colonialism still exist in Africa. Technology has exploited the agricultural land of Africa. 70 percent of the grain produced in Africa is to feed the cattle of the United States, China and other countries," she said.

● South Africa: fighting for justice

By KIMBERLY A. BURGE
Collegian Staff

In South Africa, Blacks are treated like machines instead of humans. A number is the only way to identify them. It tells where they work, where they live and it even marks their graves when they die.

This was the crude reality shown in "South Africa: The Raising Tide," presented Wednesday at the University of Massachusetts as part of South African Divestment Week.

Throughout the film, the harsh realities of apartheid were revealed.

The Africans are outcasts in their country. They are only allowed to come into the cities to work. There is a specific time in which they must be out of the cities. If any workers are left in the cities after curfew, they are automatically jailed.

Educating Africans is of little importance to the Whites. They believe young children don't need to know how to read or write. The teaching of teenagers is restricted to learning basic skills so that government will be able to fill job quotas.

Whites in Africa are benefitting from the sweat and toil of non-white workers. They are living, playing, eating, and drinking hard, while Africans have barely enough to eat, live in shanty towns, have no sanitation, and they have very little water. Everyday is a struggle to survive.

The second film, "Crossroads South Africa: The Struggle Continues", focused on a shanty town named Crossroads and how the workers and their families survived.

Male workers are required by the government to live in bachelor quarters while their wives and children have to live in shanty towns, the movie showed. A shanty town is nothing more than a crowded ghetto of one or two room shacks that house workers and their families.

The worker has to have a pass in order to get a job. When a worker gets a job, he has no control over the work conditions or low salary. When he is no longer able to work or the economy no longer needs his labor, he is sent back to the bachelor's quarters.

Crossroads and other shanty towns are often raided or destroyed by the police by orders of the government. Many of the raids occur at midnight and the people are dragged out of their homes, their shacks burned, and their neighbors are sometimes beaten.

Minority drop out rate concerns professors

By YADIRA A. BETANCES
Collegian Staff

Lack of funding and school supplies, economic problems within the minority community, and racism are dominating factors in the high percentage of minority high school student drop-outs, according to professors of education at the University of Massachusetts.

According to the U.S. Census Bureau 17 percent of blacks and 39 percent of Hispanics over the age of 25 have not completed their secondary school education in Massachusetts. Twenty percent of Asians and 18 percent of American Indians drop out.

Nationally, 64 percent of blacks and 45 percent of Hispanics 25 years of age have completed high school. Only 12 percent of both groups have finished four or more years of college.

Sonia Nieto, associate professor of education, said Hispanics have traditionally had a high drop-out rate in the U.S., because "they feel the education is not meaningful to their culture and language background."

"They are pushed out. They don't drop out. The whole system is structured in such a way that it makes it hard for Hispanics to succeed," Nieto said.

Lucy Nguyen, a Bilingual Collegiate Program advisor, said Asian students normally don't drop out of school because "for centuries education is the priority in (our) life."

Nguyen said Asians know an educational background ensures a successful life. "A teacher is above the father," in Asian cultures.

She said parents give children physical and emotional learning while teachers provide intellectual and spiritual education.

"Schools are reflective of the culture and the values of the larger society," Nieto said adding that teachers are not only insensitive to the children, but cultural and economic stereotypes play in how a student achieves.

"The schools themselves are falling apart physically," said Chester Davis, professor of Afro-American Studies who teaches a course on the Foundations of Black Education in the U.S.

Davis added that loitering and vandalism in urban areas make students lose interest in school. "Many give up," he said. Consequently, the rate of adult illiteracy is increasing year by year.

According to Davis, there is no alternative in terms of gaining a formal education for drop-out students. If there were alternatives, they would be publicly funded, like public schools are, but "the public money is dieving out and they're leaving students with no viable alternative," Davis said.

Ethiopians talk about crisis

By YADIRA A. BETANCES
Collegian Staff

The famine devastating Ethiopia could have been avoided if the government had continued land reform efforts started in 1974. These efforts were started by a revolution bought about by the government's role in dealing with a similar crisis at that time, said Roman Habtu, a candidate for a doctoral degree in economics at the University of Massachusetts.

Habtu said the top priority is to "mobilize resources for feeding" people and then to draw plans for national development efforts geared toward the country's self-sufficiency.

"It is important for the government to mobilize all resources towards a national developing effort," she said.

She said Ethiopia is not "in the point of no return." Developing technology and economical measures will help to avoid future catastrophes.

"Ethiopia was called the 'bread basket of Africa.' It has the potential for exporting," she said.

Plagued by drought and civil war, the nation's six million people are threatened by famine. America's response to the crisis which is not limited to Ethiopia, has exceeded $60 million.

Mulageta Agonafer, a candidate for a UMass doctoral degree in political science, commends Americans', for their humanitarian concern, but recommends that they get "involved in their country's foreign policy and do us some good."

He said the media should play a more responsible role in informing the public on the causes leading to the famines.

People are humanitarian, but they are not given the proper picture of what's going on in Third World countries," he said.

In turn, the American public should question its country's foreign policy. He said it is "scary" how Americans accept America's policies.

"The damage has already been done," Agonafer said, adding that Ethiopia's problem is not merely technological, but is also a socio economical and political one. "It has to be changed," he said.

Agonafer said the Ethiopian crisis can be solved by ending the war that has continuously been fought since 1974. The US-backed regime of Emperor Haile Sellassie barred the press from revealing the effects of the famine caused by cyclic droughts the region has suffered for more than 50 years. This was met by a mass movement heightened by Somolia's invasion of Ethiopia.

In a state of emergency, the US refused to aid the movement and Ethiopians sought the Soviets' aid. Cuban forces were used to drive out the Somalians and maintained order, but the war was never won.

As the war and the drought continued, the situation became "worse and worse," he said. The Worker's party of Ethiopia, similar to the Soviet's Communist Party was formed and the media then gave attention to the strife he said.

Agonafer said the revolution has had its failures and its successes, such as peasants now enjoying more political expression and more freedom. But he said Ethiopia "is far from becoming what a country should be."

Back, but not quite so tall

Andrew M. Paven

With the re-election of President Reagan, the American public affirmed its vision of America.

Regardless of what might be said about Reagan's lack of attention to detail, the man has a vision of America that he articulates better than could any actor. He believes in his vision deeply. His is an America where things are good, people are happy, troubles are non-existent. As his ads stated, "It's springtime again in America."

"America is coming back," stated the ads. Back, one presumes, from those days of upheaval, 1963-1980; back from the horror of the Kennedy assassinations; from the horrors of Vietnam; from race riots that tore apart our cities; from the days of campus unrest, from the Watergate scandal; from wage and price controls and gasoline shortages and stagflation, and the hostage crisis. Put your trust in me, says Reagan, "America is back and standing tall again."

It is a vision of America that close to 60 percent of the public want to believe in, including many of those for whom this leadership is not working, but who want desperately for it to work for them in the future. Majorities of only a few traditionally Democratic-voting demographic groups did not vote for Reagan. Most heavily against his re-election were Jews, Blacks, Hispanics, and those who earned less than $10,000 last year.

The votes of those in the lowest income category are easily accounted for — they are in the group most hurt by cuts in entitlement programs during Reagan's first term.

But the votes of Black and Hispanic voters are troubling on a much deeper level. Minorities have never been a part of that Norman Rockwell-like vision of America in which Reagan believes. To these voters the image that "America is back" is a myth. Black families' median income has fallen twice as much as has white families' over the past four years. But when Reagan was asked about this troubling fact at a press conference the day after his historic landslide he said, "But the fact is that they are better off."

Akin to this myopic social vision is an alarming sense of nationalism afoot in this country, typified by the Olympic "USA, USA" chant; by the beating death of an Asian man by two out-of-work auto workers in Michigan last year, initially only put on probation before the story was picked up by Sixty Minutes. As a result they were re-sentenced.

"America is back" and it has "leadership that's working." But it's only black and working for some, and those for whom it is working seem as oblivious to those for whom it isn't as is Reagan himself. Or at worst, those for whom it is working see those for whom it isn't not as needy, but as losers. In this America of the new patriotism we treat "losers" not with compassion but with disdain.

If America were really "back," would the public have such a streak of nationalism running through it? Are Americans, in reality, scared? Back for now, but clinging to the edge of a cliff on a slippery slope? Countries that are doing well need not fear the less fortunate, outsiders, and outside competition.

Beneath the warm glow of optimism personified by Reagan and his "springtime in America" is a dark xenophobic reality that should be readily apparent to anyone whose parents or grandparents came to this country to escape religious or nationalistic persecution. It should be recognized as such and addressed.

'Entertainment' that is offensive isn't funny

An "entertainer" at the Blue Wall last week "joked" that a Portuguese woman in the audience should be gang-banged. Is this part of the entertainment? What does it take to make some men understand that violence against women is no laughing matter — ever?

The fear of violence is a significant factor in every woman's daily life. And because this is so, jokes about it are actually veiled threats, intentionally or not. We know of one woman who was "jokingly" threatened with rape by a man she knew. He laughed. She had an extreme fear reaction — she lost control of her bowels.

The fear is well-founded. One out of every four women will be raped in her lifetime, over 60 percent by men they know (FBI statistic).

Men, imagine carrying around this knowledge with you all the time. Then imagine that you pay money to go see a singer who publicly announces — laughingly or not — that you should be gang-banged. And imagine that such an atrocity, rather than being funny in its inconceivability, had actually just happened to a woman a few months before. Would you laugh? Or would you be perfectly justified in walking out and expecting that every other member of the audience would follow?

We applaud the Board of Governors condemnation of the incident. But they must put some teeth into their position. They must make it clear — preferably as part of each entertainer's written contract — that any University performer who uses oppression for "entertainment" will not only never be invited back but also will not be paid for that particular night since oppression is not entertainment.

Oppression must not be excused simply because it is someone's "first offense." the woman in the front row doesn't get a second chance not to have been traumatized, nor does any rape victim. And everyone in the audience gets one more message that oppression is just good fun.

Come on people, it's time to wake up

Regarding Tom Haley's cartoon Tuesday on MIG's in Nicaragua: I am frightened by a return to racist, nationalist slurs as well as the enthusiastic acceptance of unfounded State Dept. allegations. The insinuation that the Nicaraguans are liars is misdirected. It was the U.S. State Dept. that withdrew its initial claim that the MIG's were delivered. Regardless, I am concerned that students are manipulated into support of American backed terrorism in Latin America. Wake up people.

OPINION

The opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the university unless otherwise noted.

Yale's priority: dollars or ideals?

The motto of Yale University is "Lux et Veritas": light and truth. Where are these ideals in the Yale administration's present behavior toward its clerical and technical workers?

Throughout the dispute Yale has acted with complete disregard for its principles. It has substituted the ideals of "light" and "truth" for those of saving "dollars" and "cents." Unless the Yale administration shortly accepts [illegible] and first and foremost in accordance with the principles on which it was founded, its motto will become mere mockery.

The strike by the clerical and technical (C&T) workers at Yale is now in its seventh week. The issue at the heart of the dispute is not just a demand for more money. It is the first major private sector collision over the assertion that the job responsibilities of women are systemmatically undervalued and represents a major labor and civil rights issue of the 1980s: "comparable worth" or "pay equity" for the lower paid jobs traditionally filled by women.

Eighty two percent of the C&T workers are women. They are the secretaries, administrative assistants, telephone operators, computer programmers and many more necessary for the smooth running of a University.

They point out that an adminstrative assistant at Yale, a largely female category which requires two years training and an associate degree, earns an annual average of $13,524. Yale truckdrivers, on the other hand, are likely to be male, and need only a clean driving license earn $18,470. That is 36 percent more.

The C&T workers realize that this problem of job discrimination based on gender is not unique to Yale and that it reflects a general problem for women workers nationwide. Nevertheless, they look to the Yale administration for understanding and leadership as to how the inequality can be addressed.

Deborah Ross

The Yale administration offered to raise the average C&T salary by 18.1 percent by 1987. The C&T workers argue that because of their extremely low present salaries, the require larger increases in the first contract. They also claim that Yale's proposal provides smaller increases than the group has ever received, that it actually represents a step backwards. The C&T workers have called for increases averging about 29 percent over three years, subject to compromise and negotiation. Yale, on the other hand, has been reluctant to negotiate calling its salary proposal "final."

The Yale administration has stressed that there is only a limited financial pie and that only Yale can best decide how the pie should be divided. It has thus rejected binding arbitration by a third party as a resolution to the conflict.

Also the administration is claiming that there is no job discrimination at Yale, and that if C&T workers cannot support their families on current salarly levels, this reflects a national problem Yale cannot be expected to solve. The solution, the administration agrues, should come somehow from the national level - the government of courts.

All this may be good business sense, but don't we expect more from our universities?

Yale fails to recognize that as a university it has an intellectual responsibility to seek ways of treating this kind of inequality at the local level, thus providing inspiration and guidance to the rest of the nation.

Yale fails to recognize that if its problems reflect the nations problems, it should act as a role-model for the country regarding the means of solving these problems.

Throughout the dispute Yale has acted not as a University but as a business institution. But most businesses do not ascribe to the principle of "Lux et Veritas". Yale does. As such, it has a responsibility to begin representing this principle otherwise the name of Yale will become associated, not with light and truth, but with giving priority to dollars over ideals.

A matter of choice

Allison Turenton

I have been listening to the controversy over abortion for many years without taking a very active part. Now I think it's time I said something. And I want to start by pointing out that it is not fair and it is not honest for pro-choice supporters to base arguements for abortion rights on questions of rape, incest, or danger to the mother's life. Those three situations account for a miniscule number of the abortions performed in this country, and I think most people agree that abortion is justifiable in such cases. Ditto, to a lesser extent, in the case of juvenile pregancies or unwed mothers below the poverty level. But the real debate is not about abortion on demand. Does an emotionally stable, physicaly healthy, middle-class woman engaging in voluntary sexual relations have the right to terminate an unwanted preganancy?

I say yes. I say yes, I think, with greater authority than most of those who say no, because I am a woman and I have had two abortions. It's easy to reduce the issue to black and white if pregnancy can't happen or hasn't happened to you: abortion is murder, adoption is a solution, and that's that. I'm asking everyone who holds that view to stop and think about what you are saying.

The first time I became pregnant was in 1976, when I was 19 and a college sophomore. My boyfriend talked me into trusting to withdrawal, which I knew doesn't work, but I let myself be over persuaded. The second time was in 1980, when my contraceptive simply failed. No method of birth control is infallible, except abstinence - and I'd like to know how many men ever abstain from sex because a diaphragm is only 95 percent effective? At any rate, I terminated both pregnancies and I am not sorry.

An unwanted child may certainly be put up for adoption. But those endorsing this "solution" often sound as though the price were nine months of petty inconvenience. It is nothing of the kind. Having a baby is perhaps the most intense physical and emotional experience anyone can have. It permanently alters a woman's sense of self and her relationship with her own body. There is a risk of death. In our culture there is in addition a serious financial burden and, yes, a huge amount of societal disapprobation if the woman is not married. What would you have had me do in 1976, all of your who condemn me? Stay in school for everyone to point at as my situation became more and more obvious? Drop out, and disrupt all my plans and ambitions? And live how? And pay doctor bills how? My parents would have been devastated. They might have supported me, but I know they would never have felt quite the same about their only daughter. They might have insisted I marry the father, which would have been a bad mistake.

In 1980 at least I was out of school and independent, but I was making $9000 at year in the pink collar ghetto while applying to graduate schools, and the situation hadn't changed all that much. I knew my boyfriend didn't want to marry me. As long as an unplanned pregnancy is a catastrophe, women like me will choose to have abortions. Thank God we as a nation have the skill and the [illegible]ion to make them safe and legal.

The Right to Life movement says abortion is murder. The pro choice people seldom answer this charge head-on. What is murder? Murder is a word. There are canonical instances and then there are dubious cases that a jury must decide. The Supreme Court has ruled that I do not have a moral obligation to trash my whole life for the sake of a clump of cells the size of a peanut, which is moreover still part of my own body. A potentiality is not a child.

Having had an abortion is not just the same as never having been pregnant. But at least the ill consequences of some damned bad luck were kept to a minimum. I do not recommend abortion. It hurts even with an anaesthetic and yes, I have some nightmarish thoughts about the children I might have had. But for me, on two occasions, abortion was the lesser of two evils. I think I had the right to make that choice for myself. I think every woman does.

A look at the dual engines of destruction on campus

If we want to save our society we must act now. A two-pronged destructive force is slowly destorying us from within. This force is more evil than suprise exams, more insidious than red tape central (Whitmore), and more subtle than flouride in our water. These dual engines of destruction are the Walkman radio, and the Confer program on CYBER.

"What's this?" you say. "These are merely technological advances that are helping to bring humans to a new and glorious future." On the surface this may appear to be correct, but as we dig deeper the true purpose of these machines can be found. First though, let us look at the past so that I may prove to you our future is in danger.

In the beginning man was a solitary animal. Often times he would go through his entire life without seeing more than a handful of others from his own species. Slowly though, man began to socialize. He learned that with a greater number of minds to work with, he could accomplish anything. The more man socialized, the more he advanced. Now we are back in the present day world of Walkmans and Confer. Let's see if these things are helping us to grow.

Most people would call a Walkman a simple radio, but look closer and you will see that it is a radio which can only be heard while using a set of headphones. Now I believe you are starting to see my point. Is anyone around you using a Walkman? If someone is, notice their surroundings. More than likely they are alone bouncing their heads to a tune only they can hear. Not only has this being isolated himself, but he is also causing feelings of inadequacy in those around him. These people in turn refuse to communicate with others for they now feel that what they have to say is without merit. Where this chain ends no one really knows.

Now let's look at Confer more closely. To those unfamiliar with Confer, it is a computer program through which people with computer terminals may speak with each other. The number of people able to use the program at any one time is quite large. This is fine for those who live some distance from each other. Others though have come to rely on the program so heavily that they will talk to members of their own hall with it, rather than knocking on the door and saying hello.

I have told you all I can tell you. It is now my hope that you will heed my warning. My fellow social animals, cast down your Walkmans and log off of Confer. You have nothing to lose but your self-imposed isolation.

Telling Tales strikes a raw nerve

Telling Tales
at the Student Union Gallery
Until Wednesday, November 21
By CHARLES FRANCIS CARROLL
Collegian Staff

Picking up where the celebrated compendium The Image of America in Caricature and Cartoon left off, Comic Relief: the Art of Contemporary Comics and Cartoon stops at the Student Union Gallery after a much heralded opening at Hallwalls and CEPA in Buffalo, en route to New York City, destination unknown.

Independent curator Ann Philbin assembled this remarkable show and has renamed it Telling Tales may not provide "comic relief," per se, it does provide a comprehensive perspective of the powerful repertoire of current comic art.

In this case, comic art does not refer to the painting style of Roy Lichtenstein or our own Jerry Kearns who blow up single frames of comics onto canvas. Although equally post Modern, the artists of Telling Tales make no presumptions to "high art" status; these works, however graphic, are crude in comparison to the precision of realism. Yet they have real impact on their audience, far more so than the grille of an automobile for instance.

The cartoon in its very nature is a challenge to the pretenses of the art establishment and its dichotomizing between styles. This point is made in the show in one of the many precious comic books also displayed: it's a scene in Greg Constantine's Vincent Van Gogh Visits New York in which Van Gogh is shown separating two artists fighting and the caption reads, "Quelling the Conflict between the Realists and the Abstractionists!" It is not what kind of art it is, but what it means and says that really matters. (If you doubt this you can also consult the Honore Daumier exhibit at Amherst's Mead Museum, for Daumier marks the beginning of the modern political cartoon and Telling Tales shows where his lineage has led.)

Enough editorializing: if you attend the exhibit, you will see for yourself. You may be offended; many of the works are outwardly offensive. You may not laugh; most of the work isn't funny at all. You will quickly realize that the basis for all comedy is tragedy. Comedy is presented in a different way, not necessarily a lighter way as this exhibit attests, but with irony and at times bitter sarcasm.

Sue Coe's work, in particular, confronts the viewer directly on a visceral level with what is explicitly depicted. Her graphic representations of the torture, violence and rape of apartheid South Africa are sobering rather than amusing. Coe's work, which appear in Mother Jones and the N.Y. Times Book Review, are included here because of their use as illustration, their graphic quality, and their use of irony as in How to Commit Suicide in South Africa. (A limited number of the book by the same title are available for sale at the gallery.)

Other works confront the viewer more subtly depending on an implicit message and also the perspective of the viewer. Such is the case of the drawings of men attending to their erections by Jane Dickson. On the surface it seems like a dirty joke, but in fact the penis as center of consciousness is the sad disposition of many men. On the other hand, their are works about self-centered female identity, such as the perverse pen & ink drawings of Shamone Einhorn.

Yet other works follow the traditional comic strip format, here represented by Charles Burns, Mark Beyer, Greg Pantner, etc., but make a more radical comment than many of their preppy peers such as Garry Trudeau or Berke Breathed. Like jazz musicians, many of them have had to go to Europe and Japan to find work. Almost all of the work focuses on the issue of social alienation and at tempts to shock us from the safe, sanitized world of mass media.

An example from Telling Tales

Jerry Moriarty says of his quintessential character, Jack, "I see Jack as a witness of constant change adapting to each newer world with less understanding. Former values become obsolete and are a burden to him. Yet they remain underneath it all. My Jack forgets experiences so he innocently repeats mistakes."

A further word of caution about this show. It may be insulting and it may be irritating, but even more threatening it may be insulting and it may be irritating, but even more threatening it may be disillusioning. Comics attack the illusions of the mirage to which we refer as "reality" or "society." But what's wrong with that? Isn't disillusionment finally a positive experience?

Ann Philbin, the show's curator, addressed this subject candidly with me. Philbin admitted, "I've been a feminist since before it was popular, and, frankly, some of this work offends me. But even if it offends me on a political level, it makes me laugh. I know this area has a large feminist community and I'm concerned certain works will be taken out of context, since there is something here to offend everyone. Let's hit a raw nerve. It's important to get people irritated; irritation is what makes people think."

A lurid "biography" from Rivers

By SUZANNE H. GRIMARD
Collegian Correspondent

Can we talk? There's this new book by Joan Rivers that is so raunchy, they should have advertised it on the mens' room walls!

The Life and Hard Times of Heidi Abromowitz is a "biography" of Joan Rivers' former best friend and classmate, "the girl whose come-hither look inspired the discovery of penicillin." In other words, a mega-tramp. Ms. Rivers decided to spill the beans when she caught Heidi in the bushes with Joan's pet dog--who caught herpes from Heidi.

Heidi's amorous adventures in bedrooms, back seats, bull rings, mountaintops and just about everywhere else are described in lurid, hilarious detail. She progressed from "Baby Bimbo Abromowitz" to "Teen Tart" to "Hooker Housewife", with a world tour after graduation. Mount Olympus, the Eiffel Tower, Spanish bullfighters (not to mention the bulls) and Venetian gondoliers will never be the same!

There's even an Abromowitz family history, which proves that nymphomania is inherited. Those wanton Abromowitz women bedded more historical figures than Sealy Posturpedic (And you thought all Freud did on that couch was analyze patients)! After reading about Fifi Abromowitz, you won't be able to look at a picture of Napoleon with his hand in his pocket without blushing.

Women who thing they, too, are trampy, trashy, and just plain Heidiesque can take the "Test Your Tramp Potential" quiz. If you answer "yes to any of them, you'll be the joy of our fraternities.

Do you still think this book isn't the trashiest thing to hit the shelves since September's Penthouse? GROW UP!!! The illustrations by James Sherman- with Heidi in all her dumb blonde bimbo 40D glory, (are so chauvinistic] that they deserve the Norman Mailer-Bob Buccione-Hugh Hefner Seal of Approval.

The Life and Hard Times of Heidi Abromowitz is sexist, gross, raunchy, sarcastic, bitchy, and the funniest book I've read in months. Suspend your disbelief and feminist outrage for an hour and read it. Hey, it's only fiction! After all, if Heidi Abromowitz was real, shw would have visited our haven of horniness by now. Her name would be on every male student's bill--as the new Student Activities Fee!

The UMass New World Theater presents poet Lane Nishikawa in Life in the Fast Lane on Saturday, November 17th at 8 p.m. in Bowker Audorium. For tickets call the FAC box office at 545-2511.

artslines....

The New World Theater at UMass concludes its fall season with a production of Miguel Pinero's Short Eyes to be presented at the Hampden Theater November 29 through December 1 and December 6 through 8.

Short Eyes is a powerful portrayal of prison life where a group of convicts--predominantly black and Puerto Rican--attempt to preserve their sanity and create a sense of community. A white man accused of child molesting is thrown into their cell block and the stage is set for a sizzling and shocking scenario. "Short eyes" is prison slang for child molester. The play, which is explicit in both its theme and language, is not recommended for children. Tickets are available at the Fine Arts Center box office at 545-2511.

Playwright Miguel Pinero will present a lecture entitled "the Development of Short Eyes" at Hampden Theater on Saturday, December 1 at 2 pm.

Collegian's NFL Picks

Those people who run up to Peter Abraham in bars and accuse him of being under the influence when making his picks are celebrating this week. The sports editor pulled a 4-10 week that combined with the other Lucky Lebanese, Tony Betros' 6-8 week knocked the much maligned editor out of first place after a six week reign. Abe remains a game out tied with comeback kid Scott Hood.

Volleyball looks for second straight ECAC victory

The women's soccer team isn't the only University of Massachusetts team heading for important competition this weekend. Several other Minuteman teams will be in action.

The woman's volleyball team will head into the ECAC tournament facing tough competition from West Point. UMass won the tournament last season paced by Saffy Mahar and the senior is back for her final match. Coach Elaine Sortino's squad was ranked fourth in the Northeast in Division 2.

The UMass fencing team will be at home against Brown and St. John's Prep at NOPE while the wrestling team faces the University of Hartford in its only home duel meet of their final season after budget cutbacks killed the sport for next year. 126 pound sophomore Chris Lee is ranked tenth nationally and should impress.

The UMass men's volleyball team travels to Boston this Saturday to participate in a tournament dominated by schools from the Boston area.

★ Final Four Fever

Huskie goalie Laura Skaza, coming back from a recent head injury, has played stellar in UConn's two playoff wins over Cortland State and Brown. Skaza has a 0.75 goals against average in 10 games.

Coach UConn Len Tsantiris won't hesitate to play senior Sue O'Hare and her 1.09 goals against average.

If UMass can top the Huskies for the second time this season, North Carolina, the three time defending champions will await them.

"We'll take one game at a time," Banda said. "North Carolina deserves to be called number one. They are the strongest team going in the tourney.

"On any given day, they are beatable," he added. "Anyone can do it."

California, who UMass tied earlier this year after blowing a 2-0 lead, is an opportunistic team, Banda said.

"Massachusetts probably has the second best talent in the country behind (North) Carolina," Colorado College coach Dang Pilhulveeh said after UMass beat his team 3-0 in October. "The only difference is that Carolina's players are seniors and Kenny's (Banda) players are freshmen."

"It has been a lot of fun (making the Final Four), but it has been a lot or work," Banda said. "Being in the Final Four is just a great position to be in."

It's a position that wasn't too definite in the August heat. New UMass has the chance to be the hottest team in the country.

Sports information photo

Women's soccer coach Kalekeni Banda will be looking for his team to better last season's third place finish in the Final Four this weekend in Chapel Hill, N.C. UMass plays UConn on Saturday in the semi-finals.

The Final Four UMass vs. UConn

Saturday: UMass (14-2-2) vs. UConn (16-3-2) at Fetzer Field, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. 11 a.m. North Carolina (22-0-1) vs. University of California-Berkeley, (13-3-1) 3 p.m.

Sunday: Losers of semi-final games in consolation for third place at 12:30 p.m., Fetzer Field. 1984 women's division 1 soccer championship final at 2:30 p.m. at Fetzer Field. See box on page 19 for additional information.

Women play for national title in N.C.

UConn on top

By GERRY deSIMAS
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team had a tough task ahead of them when it started out this season. Coming off a third place finish nationally coach Kalekeni Banda had to be hopeful in pre-season, but he was realistic too.

"The road to the Final Four isn't as easy as people feel," Banda cautioned in the August heat. "The players will have to work three times as hard."

The Minutemen put a young team on the field in 1984, with only five letterman back, including All-Americans Lori Stukes and Chris Taggart. Freshmen were in key positions.

"We were a young and inexperienced squad," Banda said, "but we matured and improved with every game."

UMass, 14-2-2, has come along way since August and faces the University of Connecticut in the semi-final round of the NCAA women's soccer national championships Saturday at 11 a.m. at Fetzer Field at the University of North Carolina-Chapel Hill.

Defending champion North Carolina (22-0-1) faces California-Berkeley (13-3-1) in the other Final Four semi-final at 3 p.m. The finals game will be Sunday at 2:30 p.m. with the consolation game set for 12:30 p.m.

The youthful Minutemen, six freshmen and a sophomore, face a Connecticut team that is gaining momentum as the playoffs advance. The Huskies downed top-seeded Brown 1-0 in the quarter-finals to earn their fourth Final Four berth.

"UConn has been playing odd soccer," Banda said. "There is no pressure on them. We will have to minimize our mistakes and go out and show them we are as good as team as any of them."

"Lori Stukes and Chris Taggart will have to carry the load the next two games," he said.

Connecticut will be led by high scoring junior Cathy Shankweiler, 13 goals, seven assists and 31 points. Shankweiler scored the only goal that Brown gave up all year in last Saturday's win.

The woman who gained the assist on the goal is UConn's second leading scorer freshman Kim Sullivan 11 goals, seven assists, 29 points.

"Shankweiler is a very dominating player," Banda said. "She can move very quickly. (Donna) MacDougall will be looking to develop their attack in the midfield."

UMass will have to counter with team defense, like it did against Harvard.

"We want to mark them tight and pressure them right away like we did last time (a 2-0 UMass win)," Banda said. "We want to deny them the ball. They have the skills to dominate the game.

"We will have to use our energy on defense as much as possible, the offense will come through," he said.

Freshman Jolie DePauw is UMass' leading scorer with 14 goals, five assists for 33 points. Cathy Spence (22 points) and Chris Taggart (16 points) are the other top UMass goal scorers. DePauw has eight game winning goals.

"We look forward to playing against the best that there is," DePauw said. "We'll go out and give it everything we have."

The goalies could become a factor in the Game. Umass' Jeanne Paul had nine shutouts, including a 2-0 regular season win over the Huskies. Paul has a 0.46 goals against average.

Minutemen look to finish as winners

New Hampshire comes to town looking for title, UM in way

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

Both the University of Massachusetts and University of New Hampshire football teams have a tough task ahead of them at McGuirk Alumni Stadium on Saturday, but for vastly different reasons.

The 9-1 Wildcats have everything to gain by winning, the Yankee Conference title, a berth in the Division 1-AA national playoffs and the Eastern 1-AA Lambert trophy.

The 2-8 Minutemen haven't won a game since Sept. 29 against Northeastern, but have suffered through a schedule that includes five nationally ranked teams and only two teams with records below .500. They have seen the defense decimated by injuries and an offense that doesn't seem to get breaks.

But UMass is better than its records indicate. They move the ball well (315 yards a game) and have been in every game with the exception of a 20-7 debacle in Maine.

"It's frustrating to see the players we have going through this type of season," Minuteman coach Bob Stull said. "They aren't that bad, but we've played the best teams in the East and we've been killed with injuries. It's hard to prove when you look at a 2-8 record, but we could have been 5-5.

But UMass isn't 5-5, its 2-8 and if nothing else a win would be a reason for absorbing the beatings the Minutemen have taken this season.

"I give our players a lot of credit," Stull said. "A guy like Peter Tracy (a senior nose guard and co-captain) will play [illegible] kicked because he isn't 100 percent, but he's in there. I admire a Player like Peter. I admire our team as a whole. A lot of teams would've quit after losing like we have, but we're ready to play New Hampshire."

New Hampshire, winners of seven straight and 15 of 16 (a 21-20 loss to BU is the only blemish on its record) will come into Alumni Stadium (kickoff at 1 p.m.) behind junior tailback Andre Garron.

Garron, who missed four games with a knee injury, has returned with a vengence, rushing for 864 yards and ten touchdowns. He's averaging 5.3 yards a carry thanks to the blocking of fullback Mike Shriner.

"That's all they do, ram it down your throats, they'll give it to Garron and let him run. They're physical," Stull said.

UMass will again this week try a two quarterback system, junior Jim Simeone (137 for 298 for 1,441 yards and four touchdowns) will start before freshman Mike Trifari (four of eight, 35 yards and no touchdowns) will see some time in the second period.

"Jimmy will start and Mike will see some action and we'll decide who will play after that," Stull said. "Mike's been a little nervous in the game he has been in, but we haven't given up on him. He's a player."

Whoever ends up calling the signals will be looking to UMass' all time career receiving leader, senior split end Bob Simeone.

The elder Simeone brother has caught 103 passes over four seasons. He needs just 31 yards to move into first place in the career yardage race with Tim Berra (1974). He has 47 catches this season for 678 yards and all four of Jim's passing touchdowns. Jim also has played into the record book with his 137 completions this season, five more than any other UMass quarterback in a year.

The rushing game will see junior tailback George Barnwell (820 yards and three touchdowns) and junior fullback Frank Fay (four touchdowns including a 41 yard scoring rush last week as UMass dropped its sixth straight with a 27-14 loss at Delaware.)

Should the Wildcats win, they will share the Yankee Conference title with Rhode Island and Boston University, if the Rams can beat the Huskies. BU is at Virginia Military. If all three teams win, the Wildcats will probably get the Yankee Conference championship and the automatic berth into the playoffs. BU or URI would be in line for possible at large berths.

Should the Minutemen win, they won't be going anywhere but home, pleased with the fact that they aren't as bad as everyone makes them out to be.

"We can do it," Stull said. "These guys have a lot of pride and [illegible] a good deal of ability. We aren't going to fold now."

Public policy group lobbies at state house

SGA pushes for Board of Regents student seat, drinking age

By BOB BURGESS
Collegian Staff

A student representative on the Board of Regents. Short term emergency loans for University of Massachusetts undergraduates. A clause added to the proposed 21 year-old drinking age bill which would allow all 20 year-olds to purchase alcoholic beverages until legal, if that bill passes.

These are among the priorities on the Student Government Association Public Policy Committee's agenda. And when committee members today make their weekly trip to the state house, they plan to lobby Massachusetts legislators for these student issues.

According to Public Policy co-Chairwomen Beth Harrington and Stacy Roth, a student regent has been needed for some time, and last semester's attempt by the Boaard of Regents to pass a 15 percent tuition increase showed the representative was a "necessity."

Although Public Policy worked to cap that increase to seven percent, Roth said last week that the "regents' tuition policy was so controversial that it became clear a student regent is necessary to prevent this from happening again.

"The state has never had a set procedure for raising tuition, or student representation on the board of Regents. We need a student regent now more than ever," Roth said.

The regents oversee the operations of 29 state colleges and universities.

The proposal, which public policy made three years ago, has gone as far as the Senate Ways and Means committee, where it has stalled each year.

Experience offered in Oxford's 20th year

By MARY CRESSE
Collegian Staff

Ernest Hefer's University of Massachusetts students like to kid that he's Henry James incarnate- articulate, precise, having a dry sense of humor, a man at home in either England or the United States. Hofer fields good-natured gibes about his British-sounding speech: "I was in England every summer for 20 years, you know. The English accuse me of being too American."

As one who could very well qualify as an honorary royal subject, the best position to introduce American students to England as director of the Oxford Summer Seminar, now in its 20th year.

Since 1966, more than 2500 UMass students have studied at Oxford University in England on a program established by the UMass English department. Today, more than 46 universities and colleges send students to Oxford at Avon the birthplace of such literary giants as Shakespeare (Stratford On Avon is very close); Chaucer (The Trinity College library at Oxford is "terrific," says Hofer, for medieval manuscripts) and Milton. Art history, business, and law courses are offered as well, but mainly in the context of the English curriculum.

Students in the Oxford program study there for six weeks and usually earn four credits per course. The students live in Oxford dormitories.

The seminar offers programs not ordinarily found in a UMass course book, for instance, "Shakespeare's English Histories" and "Poetry of the High Renaissance."

Hofer says, pointing to the catalog, "Now look at this: 'English Art: Reason to Realism.' You learn about the Victorian age, its literature, and you do so while touring places that were built during that time. When you read Wordsworth or Shelley or any of the others, you can see what they saw in the places they went; from that you may increase your understanding of the period's writings. These courses are taught by British professors, there are no more than 12 students per class, and because of that you get to know your professor as a tutor."

Hofer likes to talk about the literature more than those "other" attractions- side trips to London or France or other parts of Europe, and lack of a drinking age. He would rather discuss Henry james than what are the best drinking holes in London.

"I can't quite say that all of my students head for the museums the first time out, but they do eventually realize they are strangers in a strange country. Simply that feeling, of having to fend for yourself for a while in a place you've never been- that's half the trip."

The next meeting for discussion of the Oxford trip will be held tonight in Bartlett 301 at 7:30.

Money saved with school lab move

By CHRIS POON
Collegian Staff

The state's pesticide testing laboratory will be moved from Worcester to a more functional location at the University of Massachusetts to reduce operating costs and provide students with laboratory experience.

Lewis Wells, director of the Division of Regulatory Services in the School of Food and Natural Resources, said the location change will save $18,000 in overhead charges.

"There's no cost to UMass, except indirectly because some of the faculty will spend some time in the lab giving input," he said.

Wells said the money for the pesticide laboratory, funded by the state and the Enviromental Protection Agency, will remain seperate from the department of food and natural resources budget account.

The laboratory that tests soil and water bodies for pesticide content is in the process of moving from the UMass Medical School in Worcester to the Cold Storage Building near Chenoweth Laboratory.

"We will be able to use the equipment, give advice and lend technical knowledge to the lab."
Richard Rhode
Associate Director of UMass Agricultural Experiment Station

"The reason why the lab is moving from the medical school to Amherst is because of problematic problems," Richard Rohde, associate director of UMass' Agriculture Experiment Station said.

"The lab was located in the department of pharmacology in the medical school and the department was not particularly interested in pesticides," Rohde said.

"I don't know why the lab was in Worcester to begin with," he said.

He said the laboratory is more appropriate here because, "we deal every day with people involved with pesticides through the department of food and natural resources."

The lab serves as the analytical arm of the State Pesticide Bureau. "Its major objective is to monitor the rates of pesticide usage," John Clark, the laboratory's director of research said.

Clark, assistant professor of toxicology, also said the new laboratory will "provide the community with a faster system of response in the analysis of pesticides in the environment.

Rohde said the overhead costs will pay for heat, janitorial services, and secretaries for the laboratory.

We've got a good pool of educated and trained people within the academic community who will work in the lab," Well said.

Under the contract between the University and the Massachusetts Department of Food and Agriculture, UMass faculty and students will gain valuable experience using $75,000 worth of equipment in the pesticide laboratory, Rohde said.

"We will be able to use the equipment, give advice and lend technical knowledge to the lab," he said.

He said students in toxicology classes at UMass will also gain first hand experience in the laboratory.

Father killed by son, 17, with hatchet after fight

HINGHAM, Mass. (AP) - A 17-year-old high school senior was charged with murdering his father with a hatchet early yesterday after he led police to the man's bloodied body, police said.

Hingham Lt. Edmond Burgess said Robert Ludwig Jr. came into the police station around 6:30 a.m. and said he'd had an argument and his father was hurt.

Police went to the home and found 56-year-old Robert Ludwig Sr., a Boston cab driver, on the kitchen floor. A small, bloody hatchet was nearby.

"He was chopped up pretty bad," Burgess said.

An autopsy showed Ludwig died of numerous head wounds and a concussion, he said.

The son was held in Hingham jail, scheduled for arraignment today on charges of murder and assault and battery with a dangerous weapon.

"The boy said it happened around 1:30 a.m. and that he wandered around during the night, walked to a friend's house and then went to the station," he said.

Burgess said Ludwig told authorities "he had an argument with his father, and as a result, he doesn't remember what happened. The next thing he knew, his father was on the floor."

Ludwig had lived with his father recently since his mother's death two years ago, Burgess said. The parents had been divorced.

Chinese doctors invent male birth control method: the plug

PEKING (AP) Chinese doctors have perfected a new male birth control device, a removable plug inserted by syringe into the sperm duct, a newspaper reported yesterday.

The front page story in the Peking Evening News said medical researchers at the Shanxi Provincial People's Hospital spent 12 years working on the plug and experimented with it by first using themselves as guinea pigs, then tested it on "1,000 healthy males."

"It is highly effective, safe, non-surgical, removable and allows for recovery of the male's fertility," the paper said.

It did not explain what substance was in the plug or how long it would remain effective, but described the device as a liquid capsule that stops the sperm.

US and USSR unite with aid to starved Ethiopia

KEMBOLCHA, Ethiopia (AP) - The 100-pound sacks of wheat being loaded from a truck onto a Soviet MI-8 helicopter bore the stamp: "Furnished by the People of the United States of America."

Americans and Soviets, in one of their major emergency-response efforts since World War II, are putting their countries' differences aside to work together on the airlift taking food and supplies to millions of starving Ethiopian famine victims.

Dawit Wolde Giorgis, head of Ethiopia's relief effort, said the cooperation is such that sometimes "we are transporting supplies by Soviet aircraft with the fuel paid for by the American government."

Journalists are ordinarily not allowed to photograph Soviet aircraft or interview Soviet crew members in Ethiopia. But an unscheduled stop last week by an Ethiopian Relief and Rehabilitation Commission DC-3 carrying reporters afforded a rare glimpse into the Soviet role in the airlift.

At first, officials shooed reporters away from the four MI-8 Soviet transport helicopters at this military base 165 miles north of Addis Ababa on the eastern edge of Ethiopia's central highlands.

Besides the four helicopters involved in airlifting food at Kemboleha, there was another Soviet MI-8 chopper fitted out as a gunship, apparently for possible use against seecessionist guerrillas opposing Ethiopia's Marxist government. What appeared to be canvas-covered field artillery pieces were parked in rows around the airfield.

Boston aids homeless

BOSTON (AP) - The city of Boston has set up a $22,000 matching trust fund to help the 2,000 homeless men and women living on its streets, Mayor Raymond Flynn announced Sunday.

City officials will use the fund to match gifts for the homeless. The money is in addition to some $1 million the city plans to spend on its homeless this year, Flynn told the congregation at Our Lady of Good Voyage Church.

"We must act to help those for whom Christmas Eve will be just another night to try and stay alive," he said.

The city is seeking warm, durable clothing and packaged, non-perishable foods, which will be distributed to the needy through social service agencies. Donations centers will be open at City Hall and Boston schools from Thanksgiving to Christmas.

Marching Band gives its last hurrah for an eventful season

By STEPEHN HIGGINS
Collegian Correspondent

In its last performance of the season, the University of Massachusetts Minuteman Marching Band entertained an exuberant crowd Saturday at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

This season has been one of the band's most eventful, including performances at a patriots game and at the Eastern States Exposition in Springfield.

The band has also performed this season before large crowds at Westchester University in Pennsylvania and the University of Delaware.

"We played to a full post-game audience at Westchester, a school with one of the best marching bands on the east coast and received a standing ovation," Steven LaFrance, a tuba player, said.

During a rendition of "Olympic Fanfare" Saturday, the band made five precise circles, which they joined together to form the Olympic symbol. The quality and organization of this year's performances, LaFrance said, is the result of hard work by more than 230 members, who attend official practices for 17 hours a week.

"This year we've pushed for musical perfection more than others, and the band has improved 100 percent," Neal Freeburn, the band's head drum major, said.

Fifty percent of the band members are first year students, according to LaFrance.

"We will keep getting better because so many of us are just freshmen now. We are lucky to have a good senior class to guide the younger members along," LaFrance said.

The tight knit group is led by band director George Parks, a music professor and author of "The Dynamic Drum Major." Parks, who was hired by the University after graduation from Westchester, is highly respected by band members, LaFrance said.

"Some people would do anything for that guy," LaFrance added.

"Mr. Parks emphasized that our main goal was to put it forth that we are the 'power and class' of New England, and leave them feeling like they can't wait to see us again," Freeburn said.

The UMass marching band will perform at Amherst Center in December to celebrate the holidays.

Corporate policies protest by women

By BECKY THATCHER
Collegian Staff

NEW YORK Carrying banners, huge puppets, drums and posters, about 500 women, including University of Massachusetts students, marched through mid-town Manhattan yesterday, to protest the policies of multi-national corporations headquartered here.

The "Not in Our Name" women's resistance action is a two day protest comprised of a legal march yesterday and civil disobedience demonstrations today.

"We're protesting against corporations because that's where policies are made, not in Washington, D.C.," said Elaine Puleo, a UMass graduate mathematics student.

The march, which at times stretched the length of three city blocks, stopped at the Upjohn Corporation where protesters hoisted a sign which said "Birth control that kills is not in our name."

Upjohn Corporation manufactures depo provera, an injectable contraceptive that is banned in the U.S. but is administered to Third World women.

The march stopped at Citicorp Bank where women chanted "apartheid is not in our name". Citicorp is the largest lender to the all white regime in South Africa, as well as one of the largest investors in the U.S. nuclear industry, according to one speaker.

The last corporate stop of the march was Harper " Row Publishers where women workers are fighting for a fair contract, according to Boston attorney Juliaune Dow.

The marchers chanted, "Union busting is not in our name." Dow said Harper & Row workers have been working without a contract since May 1983.

The women at the beginning of the procession represented "those things that are not in our name and the women who marched at the end carried symbols of women's resistance and women's enpowerment," said Lisa Sheeny, a UMass student.

Women leading the procession carried pictures of men in business suits that said, "Unemployment is good for the economy," and "Lets return to traditional values." Also, at the head of the march five women carried life-size skeletal puppets which represented "the walking skeletons in the world who don't have enough food," Ilona Sturn, a UMass graduate said.

Research chief wanted to improve labs

By DANIEL WHITE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts administration is finalizing plans to hire a director for animal research who will help upgrade facilities on campus.

According to Michael Weinburg, assistant vice chancellor of research, the job description has been completed and as soon as it is approved, the hiring process will begin.

"We hope to have someone by March 1," Weinburg said.

The new director will be responsible for coordinating the care of all animals on campus. As it stands now, each department using animals is responsible for their care.

The departments are currently monitored by the Animal Care Committee, a group of faculty members experienced with animal care, who comply with the Animal Care Act.

The committee members review procedures, and advise on how to improve animal care on campus. They also gather information on changes in federal laws and how it relates to animal care procedures at UMass.

According to Weinburg, "there have been no major problems before, we just wanted to make sure none arose."

The decision to hire a director came from an inspection made by the U.S. Department of Agriculture two years ago, Weinburg said. The inspection revealed many problems, including the need for improved caging and a full-time veterinarian. Both of these problems have since been taken care of and a subsequent inspection by the USDA this past June revealed no major infractions, he said.

"The institution (UMass) realized that we needed a qualified person to run things," Weinburg said.

★Public Policy

According to Al Wallace, an aide to Ways and Means chairman and Sen. Chet Atkins (D-Concord), problems with the wording of the current draft and the proposed number of regents must be corrected before the plan is reviewed.

"Presently there are 15 members of the Board of Regents," Wallace said Friday. "And this proposal calls for the addition of one more. This would make an even number of members, and a tie-breaking vote would be impossible."

Wallace also said that due to an error the current draft only allows for 14 members, so the bill must be resubmitted after corrections are made.

Dana Pierce, a public policy member who was co-chairman this summer, said he was recently told by an aide to Senate Education Committee chairman Gerard D'Amico (D-Worcester) that passing the student regent bill was one of D'Amico's "priorities this session."

In addition to the student regent issue, the 17-member public policy committee is trying to free money which is obtained by the University through shoplifting fines for emergency student loans.

Student Clerk of Courts Mitchell Roye said Friday that the shoplifting fines make up the University's "Judicial Sanctions" account, which is part of the Student Activities Trust Fund. He also said his office processes between $150 and $200 per week in shoplifting fines in the University Store.

Harrington said the money in this account would be used for short-term loans to eligible students.

Another public policy priority is adding a "grandfather" clause to both the Massachusetts House and the Senate's versions of the drinking age bill. If passes, public policy's plan would allow all 20 year-olds to purchase alcoholic beverages for the duration of the year if the drinking age is raised.

Smith introduces program; no drinking for the drivers

By ROBERT KELLEY
Collegian Correspondent

At Smith College, a program has been instituted where one student in a group will volunteer to stay sober during an event when alcohol is served and drive friends home to educate students about drunk driving.

The college, as part of a state wide effort with Gov. Michael Dukakis and Universities Actively Reducing Drunk Driving (GUARDD), and the state's Highway Safety Control Board, are working together on the "I am the Driver" program.

Coordinating the program at Smith is Katherine Moon, vice president of the Smith chapter of GUARDD. The purpose of the program is "educating Smith College visitors on the responsibility of drunk driving with the hope of possibly reducing the number of drunk driving and alcohol related incidents throughout the state," said Moon.

The program was recently instituted by the Smith Students Recreation Council at their weekly Thursday Night Club party and will be repeated at all Smith social activities where alcohol is served, Moon said. The program entails offering GUARDD pamphlets to any group that may be driving home after an event. The group may then select one person not to drink.

Anyone who volunteers will be given an "I am the Driver" pin which will entitle te wearer to free non alcoholic beverages throughout the event. The beverages are supplied by the Smith dining service.

The GUARDD program is educational and will not effect the Smith College Alcohol policy except to strengthen it. The program is also not involved with the local or campus police, Moon said

Column missed the reality of Apartheid

This is in regard to Stephen Erickson's column "Education Before Action," (Collegian, Nov. 15). I'm shocked that anyone would have the indecency to write such a myopic, uninformed article on such an extremely sensitive subject. To anyone at all aware of the dynamics of the argument, or of the conditions of blacks in South Africa today, Erickson's ignorance is painfully evident.

You speak of the "Sullivan Code" (sic); I take it you mean the Sullivan Principles, guidelines to employment practices for U.S. companies in South Africa, you continually use such phrases as "for the most part," "have largely complied with," "have generally desegregated" and "in many cases." The very use of such noncommittal expressions clearly reveals the holes in the argument. It also makes clear that you, by consciously using said phrases, are aware of the fallacy of your argument yet persist in stating it anyway. The fact is, the Sullivan Principles are highly ineffective, are not mandatory and have produced no tangible results in ridding South Africa of apartheid.

You mention a poll by an "eminent" sociologist which showed that 75 percent of Black South African workers are opposed to divestment. You failed to state that the poll was conducted on 551 workers of 66,000 U.S. company employed workers from a total work force of six million. You also failed to state the fact that the poll was paid for, in part, by the Reagan Administration.

Then you get ugly. You state "The standard of living in South Africa, even for blacks, is higher than in any other African nation." How do you know? Have you ever bothered to educate yourself on the standard of living of blacks in South Africa? Are you aware that infant mortality among blacks is 25 times higher than it is for whites? Are you aware that blacks, 73 percent of the population, are allowed to live only in designated "homelands" (Bantustans) which comprise only 13 percent of the South African land mass?

I'm afraid, Erickson, you've made it quite clear that you are aware of very little of the reality of South Africa.

A child once again

As a student, I am gratified to know that I attend a "world class institution" right here at the University of Massachusetts. I have heard this mentioned many times by my fellow students during the time that I've spent here furthering my education. The professionalism shown by a majority of our professors and their willingness to work with students could never be measured on a mere scale alone. No, it would take much, much more. Backing up our teaching staff is an administration bent on improving the quality of teaching on this campus though the task may seem herculean.

Yes, we should be grateful for this bounty that awaits at our fingertips. As good as we have it, we must always, yes always, rejoice in knowing that our Board of Regents will always be willing to listen to the prattle of children no matter how senseless or trivial it may seem.

How good it feels being a child again.

OPINION

The opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the university unless otherwise noted.

Enough is enough

Despite apologizing to the Blue Wall crowd Friday night for some controversial remarks made two weeks earlier, entertainer Cliff Meyers continued offending people on the basis of their race and sex during his performance.

At one point Friday afternoon, Meyers, after inviting two women on stage to dance, pointed to a Black man in the audience and asked him to go on stage because "everyone knows Black people can dance."

This type of behavior is not acceptable and the Campus Center cannot and should not stand for it. The Campus Center should not be using student money to pay for an entertainer who continually offends minorities and women.

Two weeks ago, Meyers pointed to a woman in the crowd and made a comment that since she was Portuguese someone "should get a pool table." This reference to the New Bedford rape case should have been the last comment Meyers made while on the payroll of the Blue Wall. Instead, the BOG condemned his actions but decided to give him another chance.

There should be no second chance for people to utter racist and sexist remarks. A campus that considers itself progressive should not allow the type of "entertainment" Meyers brings to the Blue Wall.

We refuse to stand for it and we ask that no one else stand for it.

Unsigned editorials reflect the majority opinion of the Collegian Board of Editors.

Repression here at home

Rebecca Thatcher

Political repression a word one usually associates with isolated, occasionally escalating incidents in foreign countries. One day there is a story in the paper about people being killed in South Africa; the next day a story is headlined, "14 hotels in the Philippines will search guests." Then we hear that General Pinochet in Chile is torturing and imprisoning members of groups opposing his military regime.

And as the U.S. government supports brutal methods in foreign countries, more sophisticated political repression goes on domestically. Through various attacks on institutions ranging from Mother Jones magazine to the Freedom of Information Act, the Reagan administration has shown that its concern for free speech is at best selective, and at worst, non-existent.

But political repression can go beyond attacks on freedom of speech. Apparently the Reagan administration, through the Department of Enegery, has awarded an $85,000 grant to a psychiatrist who wants to study the "mental illness" of opposition to nuclear power.

In four more years of the Reagan administration, it is possible that people like Frances Crowe and Helen Caldicott be determined mentally ill, not heroes, as many had thought.

I just can't wait to see what this government sponsored study decides is a cure for their invented mental illness. Maybe it will be impeaching Ronald Reagan. But don't worry. If that were the case, it would be extremely difficult to discover after what he has done to the Freedom of Information Act.

And let's not forget the hideous crimes of COINTELPRO against Martin Luther King, Jr. and his colleagues in the civil rights movements. COINTELPRO not only harasses Coretta Scott King with tapes of him in bed with other women, and attempted to develop evidence that he was a communist, but even worse brutally tortured less well known members of the black panther party and other civil rights organizations.

People whose opinions did not match the status quo have been institutionalized for mental illness or simply called "crazy" since the beginning of history.

Another example of domestic political repression is two Bills that are now in legislative committees in the House and the Senate. These Bills make it a crime punishable by 10 years in jail or a $10,000 fine to support or be associated with so-called terrorist groups. That doesn't sound too bad, but who defines terrorism? Dont' get your hopes up, the state department is not going after the abortion clinic arsonists. They reserve the right to define terrorism. People providing suport to any group the State department does not want supported, such as the FMLN or the Sandinistas, could be facing prosecution. And to top it all off, there is a provision for a $500,000 reward to those who turn their acquaintances in for this supposed crime.

So when you read about the break up of shanty town in Chile, don't think that kind of repression is so very far away from home.

Under four more years of the Reagan administration, we can look forward to more of the same. When he was governor of California, the University of California advertised for psychologists to develop tests they could administer to applicants to determine whether or not the prospective students would be trouble-makers.

Apparently it did not work. Students were "causing trouble" and Reagan felt compelled to say, "if there has to be a blood bath, let's get it over with."

It is enough to be human

Deborah Kutenplon

On the way to the Nazi extermination camps, a Jewish father tells his children the story of Abraham's near-sacrifice of his son Isaac. That sacrifice was stopped by God's word. The father goes on to say, "Today, my children, this is another huge alter, not on a sacred mountain but in a profane valley of death... But man, unlike God, will not stop the knife. To the contrary, he will sharpen it and fan the alter flames so that they may totally consume their sacrifice."

This story, from Hasidic Tales of the Holocaust by Yaffa Eliach, ends with the father's plea: "A man-made fire, a knife held by man, must be stopped by man, by a human voice, a human hand. My children, be human in this inhuman valley of death."

In this nuclear age, as our governments fan the flames for the final offering, is it enough simply to be human? I think it is. I think it is our only hope.

As human beings, how can we contemplate burning families to death? How can we consider killing, in the most horrible way, whole cities of children? How can we consider destroying forever the trees of the fall, the mountains, the rivers?

As human beings, we cannot, and so we hear talk of "demographic targeting," "acceptable loss," and even "limited nuclear war." Military strategists play war simultion games in which bombs are blips of light and targets—cities of people—are video graphics. Pentagon officials move green pins around on a map, each pin signifying a hundred thousand deaths.

I don't know what a hundred thousand deaths are; my mind cannot grasp that number. I don't believe the military strategists can know either. I do know Marina, a beautiful Soviet pixie of six, with blue eyes full of love and laughter. And I know I would not trade her life for anything in the world.

We can commit atrocities in the name of abstract ideals like preserving freedom, defending our national interests, deterring communist agression. What do such abstractions have to do with the innocent human beings with lives and loves and dreams not so different from our own that we, righteously or fearfully, would turn into shadows?

In its People to People project, the Fellowship of Reconciliation has a poster which reads, under a picture of two Soviet children:

There is no government so worthy as your son,
no national glory so comely as your daughter.

We can kill people when they become ideals of numbers, pins or blips of light on a computer screen. Our crucial task is to keep these people human to us, and to our decision makers. Our task is to remain stubbornly human ourselves.

Deborah Kutenplon is a UMass student.

Conte and aid

Referring to a statement in the November 6 Collegian, please allow me to clarify the record. SAFA (Students Advocating Financial Aid) enjoys quite a bit of support from Representative Silvio Conte. Though he voted against the Wright Amendment, he has continually supported higher education. The Wright Amendment, in fact, is a very miniscule piece of legislation, and our position concerning this vote was not clearly stated. Conte's record shows that he has continually worked for financial aid for students. Conte has been helpful to members of SAFA and facilitates our presence in Washington, D.C. when we lobby for financial aid.

A thank you

I wish to express my appreciation to the 55,000 people in the First Congressional District who voted for me. I also want to thank those who worked at the polls as well as those who supported the campaign in other ways, many of whom I do not know and cannot reach to thank personally.

Although I was not elected to Congress, I believe that our campaign was successful in bringing to the attention of many people the necessity for new leadership in obtaining jobs, peace, and justice.

Country: a believable good time

by JAMES TAYLOR
Collegian Staff

As the final scene slowly faded out and the credits rolled on, the audience broke out in a cheer. Pushing through the lobby, I heard an aging man state, "You know, it's damn good to go see a movie and enjoy yourselves. That's pretty rare today." And I thought, this is great.

First I was skeptical about seeing this film, thinking that it was a Silkwood with farmers. But it turned out to be just the opposite. It is an intriguing and involving story about a family and their problems. It is not a living room drama, like most films today of its type. It was also the fastest one hundred and ten minutes I've spent in a dark room for a long time.

The film itself reminds me of John Ford's The Grapes of Wrath and How Green Is My Valley with a little of Hawks' Red River thrown in. Times change (or is it people) and the age of computers and big business has taken over personal life.

Jessica Lange was looking for a story like this and struck gold with William Wittliff's screenplay. The pace is extraordinary for the material presented. Moments change from harmony to anger without a gap of unbelievability.

Lange deserved an Oscar for Frances, but was robbed. She could be given one for her performance in this film as the frustrated housewife-farmer who takes on the FMHA. Her real life boyfriend Sam Shepard plays her husband. He is one of America's best contemporary actors. He only has to appear to perform, but carries his part with relaxed grace.

"It was the fastest one hundred and ten minutes I've spent in a dark room in a long time."

The direction by Richard Pearce does not particularly go anywhere, except in wonderful landscapes. This is an acting picture above everything else. The characters are shown independent and strong against the farm, the sky, and the beauty of the countryside. Compared to the way farmers have been treated in films in recent years, it's damn good to see a respectful change. David Walsh's photography is appealing and captures the look of the farmers' lifestyle.

There are a few flaws, the greatest being the conclusion, although not at the fault of the filmmakers. I was so involved in the lives of these people, I wanted to stay for another two hours.

The new Motorhead lacks direction

NO REMORSE
Motorhead
Bronze Records

By ADAM BRIGHTMAN
Collegian Correspondent

Hail! Hail! Rock and roll! Indeed, this has been the way with the quintessential heavy metal trio from Britain, Motorhead. This harvest of hardcore HM bands has expressed the power, drive, and "overkill" aspects of rock and roll through guitar, drums, horrific vocals, and the grinding bass of Lemmy Kilmister over the past nine years.

This double album compilation, however, bares their weakness along with their strengths. Uneven production values and song selection mar this collection, apparently compiled by Lemmy.

Lyrically, Lemmy is honest about himself. He harbors little affection for women and sees violence as a solution to many of his problems. These qualities are not hidden in sex lyrics, but are openly displayed.

The earlier recordings from the Overkill and Bomber LP's lack much of the bite, clarity, and speed of later material. The sludgy production of these tracks makes them sound like mid period Black Sabbath, especially when compared to their raucous live versions on No Sleep Til Hammersmith.

Their live album, off of which three cuts appear here, presents them as a true hardcore type band. This riveting statement of sonic excess ranks with such live classics as the Who's Live at Leeds and Kick Out the Jams by the MC5 in terms of presenting rock and roll as pure chaos and violence, yet with a reason for living. This is as honest and straightforward as rock can be.

In 1982, Motorhead released Iron Fist, a mostly successful attempt to clean up their live sound for the studio while maintaining their forward thrust and power. Unfortunately, only the title track appears here. Speedfreak guitarist, Fast Eddie Clarke (of the Ritchie Blackmore school) quit shortly thereafter.

Motorhead then recruited ex-Thin Lizzy axe-bearer, Brian Robertson. The resulting LP, Another Perfect Day, while not a total success, found the band in a new direction.

Violinist Julian Olevsky, assisted by pianist Estela Olevsky, will perform works of Britten, Lalo, and Mozart at the University's Bezanson Recital Hall on Monday, November 19, at 8:00 p.m. The concert is free and open to the public.

Combining state-of-the-art guitar riffs and phrases (and just a smidgen of melody) with the punk-like overkill of the rhythm section, they came up with a new kind of excruciating hard rock.

Motorhead 1984 seems a shadow of its former self. Missing drummer Philthy Animal Taylor for propulsion and guitarist Clarke, the new band lacks much in definition and character.

Sometimes No Remorse reminds me of a kid making his own cassettes, simply taking his favorite hits and slapping them together with a minimum of planning. Motorhead's straight for the gut approach is best experienced on earlier records, not on this occasionally enjoyable album (also available in leather).

There will be a reception to celebrate the release of this year's Spectrum "1984 and Beyond" tonight from 5 to 9 pm in Memorial Hall. Copies of the magazine will be available, and refreshments will be served. The public is invited.

Seniors make last game the best one for UM

Minutemen had much to prove, and did

By LAURA YEE
Collegian Staff

A happy ruckus in the locker room, smiling faces, and pats of congratulations were part of the victory scenario as the University of Massachusetts senior football players left Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium for the last time after defeating the University of New Hampshire 14-10.

Although the team had been plagued with a six game losing streak, the Minutemen said the victory set an example for the underclassmen players and showed to "everyone" that the team could deliver when demand called.

"We could have given up but we played our hearts out," Bob Simeone, who broke UMass' all time career receiving yardage record with 1,569 yards Saturday, said.

"We definitely set an example for the younger players because we showed how to comeback in the losing season, and that's what I'll always remember," Simeone said.

He said he has felt the pangs of the season's defeats and attributed the losing streak to "bad luck."

"Call it whatever," Simeone said "but all that matters is that we beat the number one team in New England even though our record won't show it."

Simeone, whose next goal is becoming a pilot, said the last game will be remembered the most because "it really made the season."

This game picked up everyone's spirits, especially the younger guys. It really made the season," said tackle Don Day.

"Today's win means more psychologically," Day said. The big lineman said he hopes to pursue a career in coaching.

Glen Holden, who made several good hits at safety said the victory will provide next season's team "with a good nucleus underneath the younger players' belts that they'll remember."

"Everyone was down on us but we had something to prove before the season ended. We won and this win will change the attitudes of the men on the team," Holden said.

Todd Comeau, who also has his last season with the baseball team left to go, said the team's losses could have been attributed to the new head coach Bob Stull.

"We had the talent to do it but with the new coach being there we had to settle in" he said. Once Stull has a feel of how the team operates, a good record is inevitable, Comeau said.

"We had a tough time, I'll admit that," co-captain Peter Tracy said. "But we showed a lot of emotion out there today. When we knew we could win it in the fourth quarter both the offense and defense did what we needed to do, keep playing hard. It was a great feeling to win this one. I'll never forget it."

Nor will many UMass fans, this was truly a great one.

Illinois wins Tip-Off, 81-64

Illini defense shuts off Oklahoma, Tilsdale

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

SPRINGFIELD — The University of Illinois, specifically center George Montgomery, outmuscled the University of Oklahoma and Wayman Tisdale to take the sixth-annual Tip Off Classic 81-64 in the Springfield Civic Center.

"The first time I played Wayman I just watched (as he scored 34 points two years ago), today I went at him and enjoyed myself a little more," Montgomery said after holding the junior All-American to just 19 points while scoring 17 of his own.

The Illini, ranked second in the nation, didn't allow Oklahoma to score until the 17:40 mark of the first half and other than a tie at six and eight, led the fifth-ranked Sooners for the entire game with a balanced offense and a sagging defense on Tisdale that forced the Sooner guards to bomb away from the perimeter without much success.

Illinois had four players in double figures led by Montgomery and guard Bruce Altenberger's 14. Anthony Welch followed with 12 with Bruce Douglas adding ten.

"We did what we had to do, defense Tisdale, shoot well and rebound with them," Illinois coach Lour Henson said. "Every starter played well, they all played well."

Oklahoma cut the lead, which at one time was as high as 15, to ten with 2:46 to go on Tidale's jumper. But the Olympian's fifth foul with 2:42 to go and a bench technical gave the Illini four free throws and those points sunk the Sooners.

"Wayman is the most abused player in America today," Sooner coach Billy Tubbs complained. "This was the worst we've played in four years. Their defense wasn't anything special, we just didn't play well."

Altenberger scored ten first half points for the Illini as Tisdale was held to just eight on two-for-six shooting. The Sooners shot just 41 percent for the game (19-43) while the Illini were 52 percent (24-35). They were also 12 of 15 from the line.

"I don't know how good we are," Henson said. "Oklahoma is better than they showed today."

"Wayman doesn't foul you," Altenberger said. "He played for the flag. But you do what you have to against him. Today we did and we won.

told Jimmy about it and we tried it after coach (Kevin(Karwath okayed it. It sure worked."

UNH went ahead with a 20 yard field goal by Eric Facey after UM kicker George Papoutsidis missed the first of his three field goals late in the second quarter.

But the Minutemen, after a scoreless third period, slugged it out with the Wildcats and found themselves with a first down at the UNH 45 with 10:19 to go in the game.

A George Barnwell run for seven yards (he had 111 on the day) and a Jim Simeone three yard scramble set up a Jim to Bob 33 yard pass to the UNH two as Wissman was again fooled. Frank Fay fumbled at the one with Simeone recovering before the quarterback carried for no gain. Barnwell, on third down, got nothing. On fourth down Stull called his quarterback's number and Simeone followed Stan Kaczorowski's block for the winning points.

Volleyball fourth in tourney

The University of Massachusetts volleyball team ended its 1984 campaign on a sour note over the weekend as the Spikers placed fourth in the ECAC championship tournament, losing to Army and East Strousberg University in the consolation final.

UMass lost to Army in what was one of the premiere matches of the tourney, 9-15, 15-11, 7-15, 16-14, 11-15, and East Strousberg in three straight, 14-16, 11-15, 7-15.

Game four of the Army contest featured a thrilling comeback by UMass. Trailing 14-8 UMass, behind the hitting of Sally Maher UMass, in game five, almost pulled off another incredible upset. After falling behind 8-1, they took an 11-8 lead with Maher again leading the way. But Army took the next seven points to take the match, 15-11.

NCAA title hopes fall for soccer

UConn wins, 2-1 in OT

By GERRY deSIMAS
Collegian Staff

CHAPEL HILL, N.C. Univeristy of Massachusetts women's soccer coach Kalenkini Banda knew what kind of soccer team his 14-3-2 Minutemen were before they set foot on Fezert Field on the campus of the University of North Carolina this weekend.

"A lot of people don't realize how young we are," he said before the Final Four. "We start six freshmen. It can be an asset, the young girls go out there and go wild but they can come out and start panicking."

The Minutemen were constantly frustrated by a stubborn Unviersity of Connecticut team and saw the Huskies take advantage of UMass' defensive miscues to take a 2-1, double-overtime decision in the semifinals of the Division I championships here Saturday.

Denied the chance to face North Carolina, a 2-1 overtime winner over California in their semifinal, UMass got over their disappointment and stung the Bears in a 4-1 consolation game win, their second consetutive third-place finish. UMass' Cathy Spence scored three goals against California and set three NCAA tournament records.

North Carolina won their fourth straight national title, scoring twice in the last thriteen minutes of the game to beat UConn 2-0.

The UMass-UConn game was a great battle. UMass started off the game with a flurry, quickly attacking the Husky goal but couldn't get any good shots off at UConn goalie Laura Skaza.

UConn, outshot 15-6 in the first half, showed a few signs of life toward the end of the first half and came alive in the second half.

"We didn't control the game like we did the first time (a 2-0 regular season UMass win)," Banda said. "We left too many open spots."

"We just weren't playing together as a team," UMass' Chris Taggart said. "We were playing as hard as we could but things weren't going our way."

Regulation ended in a 0-0 tie and that in itself was a victory for UConn, who had been knocked out in the first round in the previous three years.

Both teams had their opportunities but UMass couldn't convert. Taggart, Monica Seta, an All-Tourney selection, had chanees in front of the net but couldn't drive it home.

The Huskies got their big break with just under eight minutes to go when UMass senior Lori Stukes hesitated passing the ball back to goalie Jeanne Paul in front of the net.

UConn's Donna MacDougall beat the diving Paul to the ball, moved around Paul and was tackled before she could get a shot off.

Shelly McElroy came in and scored on the penalty kick for the 1-0 UConn lead.

The Huskies struck again with nine seconds left in the first overtime, as MacDougall sent a shot over Paul, who had come out of the goal.

"Miscommunication and hesitance really killed us on defense today," Banda said.

UMass made it a game as Spence scored with 5:43 to go in the second (15 minute) overtime off a Jolie DePauw corner kick. But even with intense pressure, UMass couldn't come up with the equalizer. UMass outshot UConn 14-8.

"It could have gone either way," Huskie coach Len Tsantiris said. "The pressure was certainly on them. We had nothing to lose."

"We had such high pressure for the last 20 mintues," Stukes said. "It was really disappointing. We are a better team, we just didn't get our share of the breaks."

Cathy Spence, who set three NCAA tournament records this weekend, drives against Jennifer Kennedy of the University of Connecticut in Saturday's Final Four action at Chapel Hill, North Carolina.

Against California on Sunday, UMass didn't wait to be scored on first. "Instant offense off the bench" Cathy Spence started in place of All-Tourney selection Kristen Bowsher (slowed by a muscle bruise) and scored three times.

Spence broke the ice with 19:12 gone in the first half, taking a Bowsher pass and shooting the ball past All-Tourney goalie Mary Harvey.

Spence and Taggart socred to give UMass a 3-0 lead before Robyn Queen tallied for the 13-5-1 Bears. Spence finished off her hat trick, scoring with 21 minutes to go in the game.

With that goal, Spence set the NCAA tournament single game goal scoring mark (three), most goals in a tourney (five in four games) and most points in a tourney (11 points, five goals, one assist).

"We had to play this game well because of our pride," Banda said. "We lost a game we thought we could have won. I told my players to be proud, that you play for the University of Massachusetts. It's been a good season, why lose it now?"

Sue Bird, Carolyn Micheel (seven shots vs. UConn), DePauw, and Bowsher were named to the All-Tournament team for UMass. All of the honorees are freshmen except for Bird, who is a junior.

Simeones and defense win it

By PETER ABRAHAM

The University of New Hampshire made two mistakes before playing the University of Massachusetts Saturday at McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

The first came a year ago when they scored with three seconds to go in the game to rub it into the Minutemen with a 35-10 victory at UNH.

The second came prior to Saturday's wind-swept game when the Wildcats began talking about going 10-1, winning the Yankee Conference and going to the national division I-AA playoffs within earshot of the Minutemen.

It took UMass cornerback Carlos Silva to break up a pass intended for UNH's Mike Robichaud in the endzone with 28 seconds left, but the Minutemen came away with a much-deserved 14-10 season-ending upset victory over the Wildcats much to the delight of 5,621 frozen partisans.

"I don't care what our record was, when you play football you have some pride and when you're a senior in your last game you have a little bit extra," UM senior co-captain Peter Tracy said. "Those guys were making reservations a little to early for my liking. You don't look past us, we aren't walkovers."

In their final game as brothers, Bob and Jim Simeone provided all the points the Minutemen, 3-8, needed with Bob's 39 yard touchdown pass from Jim in the first quarter and Jim's one yard game-winner with 7:23 to go in the game.

Bob set the UMass career receiving yardage record with the touchdown catch, his fifth of the season. He also holds the career receptions record (105) to go along with the 1,569 yards.

But it was the defense that provided the spark that topped the Wildcats. Led by Tracy (14 tackles) and linebacker-turned-tackle Bruce Strange (10 tackles) in the line and defensive backs Glenn Holden and Silva when New Hampshire went to the air during the final minutes.

"Every game we lost we found a way to lose," UM coach Bob Sull said. "Today we found a way to win."

Credit the UMass defense for holding NH tailback Andre Garron to just 44 second half yards and no touchdowns in the game. The junior did total 140 yards, but was unef-fective when it mattered in the late going.

"We knew they were beating us with the counter play," UMass linebacker Dave Cavanaugh said. "So in the second half the cornerbacks played the outside and I was told to keep him to the inside. I tried to and I think I did. We all did what we were supposed to for once. It was a great feeling."

UNH struck first as quarterback Rick Leclerc engineered a 12 play (all runs) drive that he capped with a two yard plunge for the only NH touchdown.

UMass followed it up with a Jim to Bob Simeone 39 yard pass that found the senior split end all alone as cornerback Dave Wissman was fooled into playing the run.

"We saw him (Wissman) playing for the run all series so I

South African Women Face Double Oppression

by Marilyn G. Bou
Nummo Staff

Women in South Africa have a double oppression to deal with; an apartheid government and the oppression by men. In 1955, Lillian Ngoyi crossed a line she was standing in at the Post Office and stepped into the "white" line. This began the organized movement of women against apartheid. "South Africa is a very sexist society", said Penny Andrews of the NAACP who spoke at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst on November 15, in conjuction with the film "You Have Struck A Rock". Sexism, battered women and issues of the kind cannot even begin to be discussed until basic human rights can be insured in South Africa" , said Andrews.

Households very rarely consist of a husband, wife and their children under one roof. Men could only find employement on work camps, the jobs did not usually last long, leaving wives and children to fend for themselves. In order for husband and wife to be together wives had to sneak into the work camps and risk raids by the police in which the wives would be arrested, according to the film. The government, in 1955, went on to require women to carry passes just as the men do. Women however dealt with this action by active protest which lasted seven years. The women held peaceful protests, though government troops along with police often opened fire, beat and arrested them., much like the Civil Rights Movement here in America. With women demonstrating success men realized it was also their country and they burned their passes. Government officials saw this as a "direct threat" to the safety of the nation and outlawed the liberation movement. The ending protest produced a blood bath that killed 69 people. Andrews said," the film is a realistic view of the struggle of African women." Women who were an intergal part of the movement were tried for treason and banned from the areas, and every Black person is now required to carry passes.

An anonymous person from the audience responded to the question of divestment from another audience member by saying,"when you are in South Africa or know you are going back, you tell others that you love everything and everyone including the racist regime or when you return you can rest assured you will be tried and given a minimum sentence of 5 years in prison or the maximum sentece which is death. Andrews responded to the question by saying,"I cannot answer the question of divestment because I am one of those who will be returning".

On the issue of women, Andrews said, " when the issue of apartheid is dealt with properly then we as women, as people can begin to deal with the oppression of women, it will be important to see how long it takes for American women to respond to Black South African women." Andrews said,"it is a very oppresive system and often it is hard to distinguish the struggle of Black women fromthat of Black people".

The Struggle Continues

by Rod Clare
Nummo Staff

Unrest among South African Blacks against the government has been on the rise in recent months. The immediate causes for Black anger are said to be a combination of economic deprivation caused by a profound recession and a sense of political isolation due to the implantation of a new Constitution.

The Constitution offers a limited political voice to Indians and people of mixed descent but ignores the 23 million Blacks in South Africa and its nominally independent homelands. Rejection of this policy was shown in that only 20 percent of the eligible Indians and 30 percent of the eligible 'coloreds' bothered to vote members of their perspective groups into Parliament. On the very first day the new Constitution went into effect, rioting broke out in several Black townships protesting the fraudulent elections.

These actions have led to a wider protest of the apartheid system by students who refuse to attend school and by striking workers. The strike was par-

Culture Through Drama/Poetry

by Segun Eubanks

Japanese-America: Oppressed, tortured, alienated and sometimes confused - yet the culture lives strong and vibrant in the heart and in the mind. This was the message portrayed by Japanese Hawaiian poet Lane Nishikawa in the dynamic one-man performance, "Life in the Fast Lane". Produced by Sansei Productions and brought to UMass courtesy of the New World Theater Series, "Life in the Fast Lane", was performed to a packed house last Saturday at Bowker Auditorium.

Lane Nishikawa, who both wrote and performed the production, gave the audience doses of poetry, comedy and excellent monologue in an hour of enjoyable and meaningful theater. A sparsely set stage with a few platforms and a directors chair, timely blackouts and lighting technique, and taped music and sounds provided a backdrop that allowed the imagination to do the work.

The play started off with Nishikawa entering an office to be interviewed by a white publisher. As the publisher apparently asks Nishikawa some very niave questions, he replys with a quick retort and the lights go black. Nishikawa then appears at another part of the stage to present dynamic poetry about the Japenese-American experience.

"'Ashes to ashes, dust to dust', is not enough for you. ' I love you' is not enough for you." said Nishikawa in his poem Oba-Chan, a dedication to his grandmother. "The Bigot", a poem about a downhome southern white man and his dillemna over his children's romantic involvement with "Japs", provided a good touch of comedy along with the important message. Other poems talked of the oppresion Japenese-Americans had to face during World War II, The struggles of living in the city (San Fransisco), the life and death of Nishikawa's uncle, who fought for America in WW II and relationships between Asian-America and Black America.

As Nishikawa ended his interview with the white publisher, he asked the man if he was ready to hear some of his poetry. "Oh, not enough time," said Nishikawa after the obvious negative response. He then tip-toed to the front of the stage and whisered to the audience, "Would you like to hear a poem?" Nishikawa then presented the most exciting poetry of the evening with "Japanese Junkies". The poem, while challenging those Japanese who may deny thier culture, also expressed the strengh and beauty of Japanese-American culture and stressed that all of us have cultures and heritage that we must learn and be proud of.

Nishikawa's efforts were rewarded with a tremendous standing ovation as his strong message and performance obviously had a positive effect on the audience. Once again the New World Theater Series must be commended for bringing to the University another excellent performance. "Life in the Fast Lane" proved to be not only very enlightening, but one of the most enjoyable evenings of theater this reviewer has encountered. Good luck NWTS, you've got a hard act to follow.

Upcoming Events: Music/Theater, the cultural enjoyment never ends

NEW WORLD THEATER PRESENTS "SHORT EYES"

The New World Theater at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst concludes its fall season with a production of Miguel Pinero's "Short Eyes" to be presented at the Hampden Theater, November 29 through December 1, and December 6 through 8.

"Short Eyes is a powerful portrayal of prison life where a group of convicts -predominantly Black and Puerto Rican -attempt to preserve their sanity and create a sense of community. A white man accused of child molesting is thrown into their cell block and the stage is set for a sizzling and shocking scenario. "Short Eyes" is prison slang for child molester. The play, which is explicit in both its themes and its language, is not recommended for children. "Short Eyes" is directed by Smith College faculty member Patricia Gonzales.

Tickets are available at the Fine Arts Center Box Office (545-2511) or at the door the night of the performance.

Playwright Miguel Pinero will present a lecture entitled "The Development of "Short Eyes" at Hampden Theater on Saturday, December 1 at 2:00 p.m.

Actors rehearse a scene for Short Eyes, opening at UMass on Nov. 29.

Jazz vocalist Sarah Vaughan will perform at UMass on Dec. 1.

SARAH VAUGHAN TO PERFORM AT FINE ARTS CENTER

The incomparable Sarah Vaughan will perform at the University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Center Concert Hall on Saturday, December 1 at 8 pm.

A leading jazz vocalist and recording artist for the past forty years, Sarah Vaughan enjoys the distinction of being a jazz performer with the range of an opera singer. Her delivery and repertoire embrace all types of music, from gospel to jazz, and from classical to pop. Sarah Vaughan began her career as vocalist with the Earl "Fatha" Hines band and then moved on to perform with the legendary Billy Eckstine band whose personnel included, among others, Dizzy Gillespie, Fats Navarro and Charlie Parker. After leaving the Eckstine band, she joined the John Kirby Combo, and then went on to star with her own group. She will be joined in her Amherst appearance by the Sarah Vaughan Trio consisting of George Caffney, piano; Andrew Simpkins, bass; and Harold Jones, drums.

Tickets are available at the Fine Arts Center Box Office (545-2511), local DATATIX outlets and at the Springfield Civic Center. For phone charge reservations, call 1-800-243-4842. Mastercard and Visa accepted.

their town being swept by police looking for " criminal and revolutionary elements."

The strife now taking place in South Africa isn't due to totally political reasons. The government announced an increase in rent and electricity rates, enraging local residents who complain that they are already hard pressed. Many people have since refused to pay rents on the small, square homes that lie in the Black townships.

The Pretoria regime has taken an incresingly hard stance towards dissent with the arrest on last Friday of 2,300 Black workers, the biggest mass arrest in years. An equally disturbing situation is that the army has now lent support to the police in its township raids. The government has announced that regular army units will continue to play " a greater supporting role" in troubled areas. It remains to be seen how much more force the government will use against the increasingly strident demands of the South African people. ticularly significant in that it had unusual support among ordinary workers and also brought in rival unions to protest against the apartheid system.

So far st least 160 people have been killed since early September, all except one Black, while several hundred have been injured. Raids by the South African police have also been conducted in numerous townships. The police have carried out house to house searches, the most alarming of which was in Sebokeng where the town's 120,000 residents found

MIDWEST DIVISION

This may be the most balanced division in the NBA, featuring some of the leagues best scorers. 5 of the 6 highest scorers in the NBA last season play in this division. Bernard King, the only exception was 5th, edging out George (Iceman) Gervin. This division had the leagues two highest scoring guards, Gervin and Rolando Blackman.

Lest you be confused, this division also has defense. Shot blockers like Mark Eaton of Utah, Houston's Ralph Sampson, Artis Gilmore of San Antonio, LaSalle Thompson of K.C. and rookie Akeem (the Dream) Olajuwon prowl the lanes looking the throw back shots. While guards like Utah's Rick Green and Denver's T.R. Dunn continually strip the leagues best ball handlers and swipe opponents' passes.

With all of this talent why hasn't the Midwest division ever produced an NBA Champion? Perhaps it's because most of the teams are relatively new to the NBA. The only teams that have been in the league for more than 15 years are K.C. and Houston. Maybe it's because the Midwest has never had a super team, just good teams. However, within the next two years all of that could change. The Dallas Mavericks are a center away from being championship contenders, the Utah Jazz are strong and getting stronger, the San Antonio Spurs are determined to prove they are still among the NBA's elite and the Houston Rockets have the potential to revolutionize the game. Each team in the Conference has improved itself to the point were any team could win the division.

DALLAS MAVERICKS

Dallas is young (the franchise only in its 5th year) and talented. However they do not have that most important ingredient for a championship team; a center. At every other postion they have both talent and depth. At forward there's Jay Vincent, Dale Ellis, Sam Perkins and the amazing Mark Aguirre. Each one has NBA all-star ability. Derek Harper, Brad Davis and Rolando Blackman provide a young, strong, solid back court. Now they need a dominant big man. Dallas has 3 first round picks in the 85 draft and 2 first round picks in 86. They might use these picks as trades to obtain Pat Ewing or Joe Barry Carrol. Trade talks involving Jay Vincent and/or Dale Ellis have also been dissussed. However, even if they do not obtain Ewing in the draft things aren't so bad; there's a center right in Dallas, going to S.M.U. named Jon Koncak who may fit in just fine.

SAN ANTONIO SPURS

What happened last year? After 3 straight Midwest championships, 11 straight years in the playoffs and never having had a losing record San Antonio plummeted to 37-45. Part of it could be blamed on the coaching changes. Stan Albeck left to coach the N.J. Nets and Morris Mchone became the new coach. After an 11-20 start he was fired and Bob Bass (the G.M.) became the new coach; the team never recovered.

Part of it can be blamed on injuries, center Artis Gilmore missed 18 games because of fractured facial bones. In spite of his injuries Gilmore still led the league in field foal pct and finishted 5th in the league in blocked shots. Scorer George Gervin missed 6 games due to injuries and the spurs were 0-6 without him.

This year things will be different. They have a new coach, Cotton Fitzsimmons, who has a proven track record. Artis Gilmore (reputedly the strongest man in the N.B.A.) lifted weights during the off season, for the first time in his carrer, for this season. And the Spurs obtained a defensive gem in Olympian guard Alvin Robertson. Look for the Spurs to be back up to around 45 wins.

HOUSTON ROCKETS

This team is young and loaded. In Ralph Sampson and Akeem Olajuwon they have rebounding, shotblocking,low post scoring and intimidation. They have three players, Robert Reid, Lewis Lloyd and Rodney McCray, who can play small forward or off guard, giving Houston versatitlity and scoring. Mitchell Wiggins helps cement the off guard position while John Lucas and Phil Ford secure the point. More depth is present with Jim Peterson and Craig Ehlo, while Bill Fitch is one of the best coaches in the league.

One problem is that Ralph Sampson seems slightly lost at forward. He is not rebounding or scoring like the 83-84 Rookie of the Year. However, once this team jells, watch out, they will be dangerous!

UTAH JAZZ

Quick, which team had the leagues leading shot blocker, scorer, 3 pt shooter, scorer off the bench and ball thief? That's right, the Utah Jazz. Mark Eaton led the league in blocked shots, Adrian Dantley in scoring, Darrell Griffith in 3 pt. accuracy, John Drew in scoring off the bench and Ricky Green led the league in steals and was third in assists. With all of this Utah finished at 45-37, thier best record ever.

The Front court is solid with Eaton, Dantley and Thurl Bailey starting, and John Drew, Mitchell Anderson, Rich Kelley and Billy (the Whopper) Paultz coming off the bench. Premier performers Green and Griffith (who is on his way to super-stardom) are at guards but there is little back court depth. Only rookie John Stockton is a solid contributor. However, if Utah can coax a few more rebounds from Bailey and Eaton and both of them can become more effective offensively, Utah could go a long way.

DENVER NUGGETS

The highest scoring team in the league has a new look this year. Coach Doug Moe is preaching defense but in this town offense is still the name of the game. Front court players Alex English, Dan Issel and newly acquired Calvin Natt can fill the rim to the brim. This year however, with Natt and new man Wayne Cooper they also have rebounding and a little defense. Another banger is Danny Schayes who may see less time with the acquisition of Cooper. Denver's backcourt is headed by Lafayette Lever who came over from Portland with Natt and Cooper. Lever is a point guard who can pass, shoot and play defense. His back court mate is T.R. Dunn, who has led the team in rebounding the last two years. Mike Evans adds back court depth. Denver will be exciting, however, until they get an off guard who can shoot and a rebounder who can play defense - exciting is all they'll be.

KANSAS CITY KINGS

The Kings have talent and depth. Unfortunately it's all in the skill positions (guard, small forward). They are lacking in the positions of power forward and center. In Larry Drew and Reggie Theus they have one of the finest backcourts in the NBA. Third guard Mike Woodson can score with anyone and Don Buse is a solid, dependable point-guard. Small forward is set with Eddie Johnson, one of the leagues underrated players. Billy Knight is an explosive scorer who adds instant offense when Johnson comes out for a breather.

Now the problems begin. At power forward Mark Olberding is the incumbent but he has not been the answer. The Kings do have a prospect in Otis Thorpe, however. Thorpe may turn out to be a blessing. At center, Lasalle Thompson at 6'10" does not have the height or the offensive skills to play center. Perhaps he is really a small forward. However, he does block shots, rebound and play with intensity.

PREDICTIONS

The Midwest is the most evenly matched division in the NBA this year. Any one of the six teams could win the division of come in last. Here are my fearless predictions:

1) Dallas Mavericks
2)San Antonio Spurs
3)Houston Rockets
4)Utah Jazz
5)Denver Nuggets
6)Kansas City Kings

THANKSGIVING FOR WHAT?

Yes, you have a day that you call Thanksgiving. A day in which you rejoice when Europeans came and killed the Red man. How grateful you are for that!
Yes, on this day you eat your turkey and your cranberry sauce while you pat yourself on the shoulder and say, "aren't we good murderers"
No guilt or remorse on this day is shown; only red, giggling faces at the family table.
Yes, grin, grin, you have alot to be thankful for since Europe flushed you out of her latreen.
Where are the Potcuwatami, the Sioux or the Iroquois? Are they dead? No they shall never die because their spirit lives.
They, like their brothers, are vagabonds in their own homeland - the Bantustans of the U.S.A.
What have they done to you Red man.
What have they ever done for you to be thankful for?
They gave you blankets that killed you.
They scalped your men, women and children.
They even cut off your women's breasts.
And now they ask you and I to join in this celebration of blood. NEVER!
There is nothing to be thankful for if you are either Red or Black; unless you like being the victim of GENOCIDE.

SOME HOW WE SURVIVE

Somehow we suvive
and tenderness, frustrated, does not wither.

Investigating searchlights rake our naked unprotected contours;

over our heads the monolithic decalogue of facist prohibition glowers and teeters for a catastrophic fall;

boots club the peeling door.

But somehow we survive
severance, deprivation, loss

Patrols uncoil along the asphalt dark hissing their menace to our lives,

most cruel, all our land is scarred with terror, rendered unlovely and unlovable;
sundered are we and all our passionate surrender

. but somehow tenderness survives.

AUGUSTA SAVAGE GALLERY EXHIBIT

On the 8th of November, 1984 "The Luis E. Guarnizo Exhibit" opened at the Augusta Savage Memorial Gallery. The exhibit includes Senor Guarnize's paintings and drawings.

The strength and dramatism of his work will move the viewer to see Columbian life, the pain and the anguish yet above this the colour and the beauty of the society. Senor Guarnizo is presenting us with volumes of feeling and colour which harmoniously protray man's universal quest for strength and peace.

His painting technique explodes with warm and strong "Alla Prima" colours expertly executed through the exclusive use of knives. This unique combination generates rich and deep textures.

The exhibit will run until November 21

The Augusta Savage Memorial Gallery is open to the public and our regular hours are Monday thru Friday, 10 a.m. to 4 p.m.

JAZZ CONCERT SERIES

Starting Monday, November 12th at 9 p.m., Amherst musician Greg Chapopoulo will launch the first of six weekly jazz concerts to occur on Monday nights in the Tavern of the Lord Jeffery Inn. These concerts will feature the talents of Black artists from New York and New England. A different guest performer will be highlighted every week, some of whom are top name recording artists. Last spring, Greg Chapopoulo submitted three proposals to the Amherst Arts Council for review, and this concert mini-series is one which was late approved. The Lord Jeffery Inn has matched the Arts Council funds, and Valley residents can now enjoy these weekly Monday night performances through December until Christmas week. THE PURPOSE OF THE SERIES IS TO HIGHLIGHT AFRO-AMERICAN MUSICIANS AND THUS FOSTER A GREATER UNDERSTANDING, APPRECIATION, AND AVAILABILITY OF LIVE JAZZ MUSIC.

The Monday night shows in the tavern of the Jeff will begin at 9:30 p.m., and will consist of two shows. Future guest artists will be listed in local papers.

BOG faces eroding clout, says official

By GREG BROWN
Collegian Staff

The Campus Center Board of Governors is re-evaluating its strengths and weaknesses after the assistant director of the CC said last week that the Board has less power "because they can't handle it."

BOG Vice Chairwoman Karen-Karina Gray said the Board has recently come up against "numerous accusations" which she said are false, including specuation that the Board did not act swiftly enough in reprimanding a controversial entertainer in the Blue Wall.

Campus Center Assistant Director Bernard Wilkes told the Collegian after last week's board meeting that the BOG does not have any input on current issues in the Campus Center complex, that it is "strictly an advisory board to help plan the future."

But BOG Chairman Robert Abele argues that the Board has a say in the present, too.

Abele said, "The Board's power has eroded over the past 10 or 12 years. But we do serve as a watchdog over the Campus Center administration. An example is the letter we sent to (Food Services Director) Richard Ellis telling him we did not condone (singer Cliff) Myers' comments."

Myers, who has a contract with Food Services to entertain in the Blue Wall on Friday afternoons, has come under criticism from the BOG and the Collegian Board of Editors for the questionable taste of material used in his act.

Meyers reportedly pointed to a woman in the audience at the Blue Wall two weeks ago and said that since she was Portuguese, someone "should get a pool table," a reference to last spring's New Beford rape trial in which four Portuguese men were convicted.

"As bad as they (the comments) were, we could only give the guy a slap on the wrists the first time," Abele said. "Our initial reaction was to get rid of the guy, but there are a lot of legal technicalities involved in terminating a contract. He could have sued us easily."

Abele said the BOG's other powers include selecting and scheduling vendors on the CC concourse, allocating space for student groups in the Campus Center and Student Union Building, and issuing food waivers to registered student organizations that do not want to use Food Services.

Abele said the Campus Center administration has most of the power in decisions about the CC/Student Union complex.

"They're looking out for the students' interests, but not as much as they should be. After all, this is the students' building," Abele said.

"What we mostly do is put together proposals, and send them to the administration," he said. "Most of them get rejected, though."

Canines on Campus:

Crackdown urged as dogs roam university, attack other animals

By ANDREW WOLFF
Collegian Correspondent

Unleashed dogs roaming the campus and attacking the Animal Science department's sheep have prompted the University of Massachusetts officials to consider a leash law.

UMass Public Safety Director Gerald O'Neil said the University policy would be similar to the Amherst dog bylaws which do not permit a dog off its owner's property unless it is leashed or under the owner's control, properly licensed in Amherst and vaccinated against rabies.

"I have no problem with dogs on campus, as long as they're on a leash," O'Neil said. "We don't want a dog just wandering along."

University policy prohibits dogs from entering dormitories and campus buildings although canines are often found roaming in such places.

There have been two attacks by dogs on sheep in the past month, according to Kristen Whittle, techical assistant for the Animal Science department.

"Animals got hurt that time," Whittle said. "The dogs go for the jugular and hind end with sheep and they really do some serious damage."

Whittle said some lambs had to be killed last year after the wounds suffered from dog attacks were too serious to be treated. In the attack last month, a pregnant ewe was severely bitten.

"I thought she was going to abort her pregnancy right there," Whittle said.

Although University officials cannot estimate how many loose dogs wander campus, Peggy Thompson, Amherst special police officer in charge of animal control, said there were about 1,200 dogs in Amherst in 1982. She estimates that in 1983, the figure rose to 1,500 and has remained the same this year.

Thompson is conducting a door-to-door campaign through Amherst, excluding campus buildings, which are not in her jurisdiction, that she said is aimed at gaining a more accurate head count of how many dogs call Amherst home and catching license evaders.

> "Dogs go for the jugular and hind end with sheep and they really do some serious damage."
> — Kristen Whittle, Animal Science Dept.

Thompson said that in 1983, an estimated 500 dogs went unlicensed and about 300 to 500 dogs have gone unregistered this year.

"We have asked many times for a dog officer and we have gotten no where," UMass Police Chief Robert Joyce said. "The town has recognized responsibility of the dog problem, it is time for the University to do so."

The Amherst Dog Officer is not allowed on campus. The UMass police, when responding to complaints of growling and barking dogs, must catch the dogs themselves and use a patrol car to transport them to the Amherst Dog Pound.

"We shouldn't commit manpower to average complaints," Joyce said. "If you throw a dog into a cruiser, you have to clean the damn thing after."

Joyce's solution is to extend the jurisdiction of the Amherst Dog Officer onto campus. Sgt. Dexter Shearer said he believes there should be a ban of dogs on campus.

"There is no reason for students to bring their dogs to campus," said Shearer. "The only person who needs a dog is a blind person. There is no need for them otherwise."

A total dog ban on campus "would be impossible to enforce," O'Neil said. "We would not have a problem if (dogs) would not follow students onto campus. But how can you stop that?"

Fire on helicopter kills three Marines

CAMP LEJEUNE, N.C. (AP) — Fire broke out aboard a military helicopter as it lifted a heavy peice of artillery during a training mission yesterday, killing three people and injuring at least 12 others, officials said.

Capt. Norma Stewart of New River Air Station estimated that 20 to 25 people were aboard the $22 million CH-53E helicopter, the fMarines' newest and largest, which can carry 55 troops or 32,200 pounds.

Rescuers were combing the area in search of other victims, said Stewart, who provided the casualty figures.

The helicopter was lifting a 155mm howitzer when the craft caught fire, said Capt. craig Fisher of Camp Lejeune's public affairs office, but he said he did not know if the copter had crashed or landed normally.

Anthony Rothfork, spokesman for the Marine Corps in Washington, D.C., said the helicopter did crash, but Lance Cpl. Greg Fedorev of New River Air Station just south of Camp Lejeune, where the craft was based, said he could not confirm that.

"There was a fire on board...but as far as I know it hasn't been confirmed that there was a crash," said Fedorey.

20-yr.-olds won't lose booze

BOSTON (AP) — The Massachusetts Senate has agreed to a "grandfather clause" that would allow current 20-year-olds to continue to drink legally if the state raises its drinking age to 21 next year.

The Senate voted 33-1 yesterday to support the amendment to exempt 20-year-olds. The bill now faces routine enactment votes in each chamber before going to Gov. Michael S. Dukakis.

The Senate has resisted moves in recent years to raise the drinking age due to arguments that it would just encourage young motorists to drive to neighboring states to drink, then drive back home inebriated.

The sky over Mexico City glows after several explosions at a natural gas refinery early yesterday morning. The resulting firestorm ravaged a nearby neighborhood, leaving at least 200 dead and hundreds injured.

Mexico City blasts claim over 200 lives

MEXICO CITY (AP) — A string of earth-shaking explosions yesterday at a natural gas plant on the outskirts of Mexico City turned a nearby slum communtiy of wooden shacks into an inferno, killing at least 212 people, the coroner's office reported.

Red Cross and police officials said at least 500 people were seriously injured by the explosions and flames that devastated the area around the fuel storage tanks.

Dr. Luis Sanchez Guerra, the Mexico state coroner, told reporters at the blast site that 212 people were known to have perished.

Other authorities said they expected the death toll to rise as search teams dug through the smoking rubble.

Many of the charred bodies were placed in plastic bags and taken to a nearby police station, where officer Jose Islas said he had counted 154 as rescue crews continued to arrive with more corpses.

Col. Jose Domingo Garrido, the police operations director, said at least 80 homes were destroyed.

One tremendous blast shook the crowded suburb of Tlalnepantla at 5:42 a.m. 6:42 a.m. EST, followed by perhaps a dozen more explosions, residents said. Balls of fire shot into the air and rained fiery debris on homes and businesses. Plumes of dark smoke rose a mile into the sky as the fire raged out of control for more than seven hours.

Federal Police deputy spokesman Hector Garcia Vasquez said 100,000 people were evacuated from the area, many of them in school and city buses.

Police Chief Ramon Mota Sanchez said 66 acres were "virtually razed."

He said four storage tanks holding more than 3 million gallons of liquefied gas each exploded, and authorities were afraid the fire would trigger more explosions in other near-by storage tanks.

By mid-afternoon, as the fire was brought under control, officials decided not to blow up a 1.3 million-gallon tank under controlled conditions in order to keep the fire from spreading.

"It is perfectly controlled," Mota Sanchez, the police chief announced, "and now there is no danger of additional explosions."

Flag salute dispute continues

RANDOLPH, Mass. (AP) — A high school senior, saying she heard she "might get hurt," called off her planned return to school yesterday and continued a week-long absence that began when she received threats over her refusal to stand for the Pledge of Allegiance and the national anthem.

Susan Shapiro, 17, did not attend Randolph High School after a newspaper article sparked what she called threatening phone calls and letter. The article described a September argument between Shapiro and her homeroom teacher over Shapiro's refusal to participate in the opening exercises at school.

"I heard it wasn't going to be nice today. I heard I might get hurt," Shapiro said yesterday. "I'm really not supposed to talk about it."

"I wanted to come back to school," she added, refusing to disclose the source or content of the most recent threats.

UMass 'assumed' to obey new toxic substance law

By JOHN YONCE
Collegian Staff

Although many Massachusetts companies haven't complied with a new law requiring them to inform their employees and the state about the toxic substances they use, the University of Massachusetts is "assumed" to have complied, accordinv to the state Department of Environmental Qualtiy Engineering (DEQE).

"We can't tell company by company yet," said John Higgins, regional environmental engineer for the DEQE. Higgins said that UMass is "assumed to have complied based on a number of conversations with people from UMass."

The new "right to know" law required the University to provide a list of toxic substances used by employees to the state by Sept. 26 and to inform employees on request of the nature of certain hazardous substances. Employees must attend a one hour training session each year to learn how to read "material safety data sheets," which list the contents of and gives precautions for use of certain substances.

"Physical plant and graduate research probably have the most requests (for data sheets)," said Alan Compagnon, vice-chairman of the University Safety Committee.

Compagnon said that some substances, such as certain grades of petroleum and consumer products are exempt from the right to know law.

The purpose of the right to know law, according to Higgins, is to "help the employee know what chemicals he is using.

"The real benefit is to people who are exposed on a day to day basis," Higgins said. He said that many people are exposed in jobs that they don't ordinarily think of such as jobs in hair salons, auto body shops and gas station.

"A hairdresser may be giving ten perms a day and not know what chemicals they're using," he said.

UM women arrested in protest

By REBECCA THATCHER
Collegian Staff

Three University of Massachusetts students participated yesterday in a civil disobedience action at the entrance to the Stock Exchange in Manhattan which resulted in 100 arrests.

The arrested UMass students are Kathleen Offenhartz, Deborah Neubauer,and Randi Saslow, according to Fiona Macaulay, a student who was not arrested.

At 9:30 a.m. about 100 women sang and chanted as they blocked the entrance to the Stock Exchange with webs made of yarn, according to Sue Walsh, a Mount Holyoke student at the Not In Our Name office in New York City.

Police spent two hours carrying away the women, who were "not cooperating," Walsh said.

The civil disobedience was the second part in the two-day Not In Our Name protest against multi-national corporations.Sunday, 500 women marched through midtown Manhattan.

The protest was aimed at corporations because they are at the heart of the oppressions in the world, according to an organizer's statement.

"We are here to show that our interests are not represented, and to proclaim that corporate exploitation, militarism, violence against women and the racism and sexism inherent in these institutions is not in our name," it stated.

The protest especially targeted Upjohn Corporation because it manufactures Depo-Provera, a dangerous contraceptive, at Citicorp because it invests in South Africa and in nuclear weapons, and at Harper & Row, where women have been working without a contract since May 1983.

Macaulay, who went to New York to help with the civil disobedience and provide support to those arrested, said the action went well.

"I think we had a good effect, quite a lot of people were supportive," she said.

Students pressing to end Yale strike

By DENISE FULLER
Collegian Correspondent

Some Yale students say the University administration has returned to the negotiating table with striking clerical and technical workers largely due to student efforts.

Two weeks ago, the Coalition to End the Strike sent a letter to the administration and Local 34, the striking union, asking the two parties to resume negotiations.

Last Monday, members of the union's collective bargaining unit and University representatives resumed negotiations for the first time since October 9th, although no firm agreement has been reached.

Despite the resumption of negotiations the Coalition to End the Strike held a three-day moratorium on classes last week.

"Recently, people have been ignoring the strike, and this is why we've created the moratorium," said Yale student Eden Quainton.

Since the strike began on September 26th, University cafeterias have closed-students receive $70.00 a week for meals-dormitory bathrooms have not been cleaned, and libraries are open only for limited hours.

Last Thursday, approximately 350 members of the Yale community rallied in support of the strikers in the second day of the maratorium.

"I'm out $2,000 of financial aid because I'm honoring picket lines at my work study job, and it's hard to get the things you're used to. It's an education going on here, but it's not a Yale education," student Karrie Costello said at the rally.

Though the majority of classes are still being held on campus, students must cross picket lines to enter many buildings. Teaching assistants have moved many discussion sections off campus in support of the strike.

"We've had good student support throughout the strike and I think enthusiasm is still very high. The students realize we won't go back to work until we have a good settlement," said Loretta Calini, a striking department secretary.

The New Haven community has also supported the union. Local churches have given office space to the strikers and a New Haven bank is allowing striking union members to forego mortgage payments until the strike is settled according to Barbara Eton, a striking administrative assistant.

Despite the amount of community and student support the striking clerical workers have received, union spokespeople admit that 90 members have returned to work.

Vandalism, attempted theft, fire reported

By JOEL P. COFFIDIS

University of Massachusetts police Monday reported about $2,000 in losses and damage to six cars parked in the same area of lot 44 Sunday morning.

Police said that three car stereos were stolen and all six cars had been broken into and vandalized.

The incidents occurred between 8:30 p.m. Saturday and 9 a.m. Sunday, police said.

In other UMass reports, a 23 year-old student was arrested about 9:15 Saturday for stealing a man's wallet in the Campus Center arcade room.

According to police, the victim was playing pinball and had put his wallet down on an adjacent machine. The suspect, who had denied stealing it, was eventually searched by officers who found the wallet in his possession.

A small fire in a dormitory room in Mackimmie House was reported Friday about 7 p.m. Police said the fire was caused by clothes being left on a toaster oven, but that no damages had resulted.

A hit-and-run accident on the fourth level of the Campus Center Garage caused more than $375 in damages to a 1972 Buick, police reported. The incident occurred between 12:30 p.m. and 2:25 p.m. when it was reported, according to police.

A tenth-floor John Quincy Adams dormitory resident reported to police that she was woken up about 3:20 a.m. Sunday and saw a male intruder in her room. The man, who was leaning over her stereo, ran from the room when the women yelled for help. Police said they have only a limited description of the man.

Amherst police Monday reported several weekend housebreaks, including one in which a masked intruder was surprised by the returning homeowner.

According to police, a Harvard Ave. woman reported Friday that she had left her home about 6:30 p.m., and had locked all doors and left on one light. When she returned about 8 p.m., all the lights were on.

A man wearing a wool ski mask then came from the upstairs, pushed the women aside, and fled the house.

According to police, entry had been made through a pried-open cellar window. Nothing has yet been reported missing from the house, police said.

Letters to the Editor

Some can't take a joke

In reference to the Collegian editorial titled "Enough is Enough," you're right. There has been enough already.

To many UMass students, the Cliff Myer happy hour is synonomous with good friends and a good time. Although he does tease some of the people in the audience, it is understood that it is all done in fun. Unfortunately, there are those few thin-skinned people who cannot take a joke.

There are several people that voluntarily participate in Cliff Myers' act every week. It would seem to me that anyone who sits in the front row during a comedy show is asking to be a participant. Did this black person that you speak of complain, or are you speaking for him?

It is amazing that so many college-age students who praise the work of comedy stars like Joan Rivers, Eddie Murphy and Johnny Carson can't seem to recognize comedy when it's in their own backyard.

The cartoon implying that Cliff is a member of the KKK is inexcusable. You journalists, who are the watchdogs of free speech and free expression and supposedly slaves to fairness, accuracy and balance, should be ashamed of yourselves.

Do you call defaming an entertainer without offering another side to the story responsible journalism?

If you ask me, your mean and unfair accusations are far worse for our society than anything Cliff Myers could say during a comedy hour.

There is an alternative

In Friday's column "A Matter of Choice," Allison Turenton gives her reasons for not carrying her baby full term. I was upset that she believes that by seeing an unplanned pregnancy to term she would have "trashed her whole life for the sake of a clump of cells the size of a peanut." I respect her decision but would like to share my experience because I carried my child to term and did not encounter the social taboos, nor have I suffered a trashed life as she has implied is the result of such a decision.

My situation might be classified as typical. I was 19 and a sophomore involved in a growing relationship which included sex and birth control...that failed. There is nothing typical about the devastating feeling when the doctor confirms your deepest fears, "the test was positive," and shatters your highest hopes.

I was forced to make the choice between life and no life as the pro-choicers put it or life and death as the pro-lifers put it. Mine is not to judge which view is right. I want to express the fact that when it happens to you, the choice is yours alone based upon what you know, your support system, what you believe in, and your situation and emotions. It is not based upon which view is currently enjoying the most popularity.

My partner and I decided against marriage as our relationship was not as mature as was our decision to engage in sex. Although separately we came to the decision to put our child up for adoption during my pregnancy, the decision had to be made again after she was born. Giving birth is a most moving and incredible experience, planned or not.

The "huge amount of societal disapprobation if the woman is not married" while pregnant has dissipated to a huge degree. While pregnant, I was a student at UMass and working in Northampton up to my seventh month. Fellow students began to notice, some inquired, some wanted to but didn't, most simply didn't notice or minded their own business. I am from Northampton and constantly ran into people I knew. Times are changing. Yes, people will talk, but condemnation and blacklisting are things of the past. The people I met who learned of my situation were generally supportive and introspective, relieved that it wasn't happening to them or to their children. The society that is educating itself about birth control and the implications of its use and is openly talking about abortion is the same enlightened and accepting society you will encounter when these methods fail, or when you make the choice to carry your child to term, married or not.

Putting your child up for adoption is a painful experience as is abortion. I know my child is alive. I know that she is being raised by a couple who could not have children and who for four years waited and participated in an adoption program to prepare them for her arrival. I know their occupations and religion. That is about all I know, but I have learned much more. Adoption is an alternative.

M.C. is a senior at UMass.

Broach is brooch

About your new comic strip, Nuclear Broach: not to be picayune, but isn't it spelled "brooch"? See what your dictionary says. Also, I think "Yeasthead" is great, and "Gorde" is consistently good.

Lisle Leete Belchertown

Correction

Due to a typographical error, a sentence was changed in Allison Turenton's column Friday. It should have read, "But the real debate is not about abortion with mitigating circumstances. The real debate is about abortion on demand."

Courts and the death penalty

Andrew M. Paven

When the Massachusetts Supreme Court ruled last month that the capital punishment law, signed by former Gov. Ed King, which took effect on January 1, 1984, was unconstitutional, court watchers in Massachusetts were not surprised. By relying on their own precedent of the last 12 years, the court could have found any number of reasons to strike down the latest law.

What is interesting, however, is the narrowness with which the Court wrote this latest decision, and also the narrowness (four-to-three) of the majority.

The Massachusetts Supreme Court has ruled on capital punishment four times since the U.S. Supreme Court first found the punishment unconstitutional in 1972. Though the Federal Court has since legalized the death penalty, contingent on certain procedures, the Massachusetts Court has consistently found the punishment of death unconstitutional in and of itself, regardless of what safeguards might be put into place.

The three decisions previous to this most recent one were impassioned arguments in which the justices quoted Shakespeare, Aristotle, Jefferson, Bacon, as well as Friend of the Court briefs submitted by inmates on Death Row. On this tack the court questioned the debilitating psychological aspect of those who must wait for their appeals on death row. (While students of literature might read Dreiser's An American Tragedy, students of law might read the brief submitted in 1980 by inmate Henry Arsenault.)

On another tack, the Mass. Court cited statistics about those who were sentenced to death. They are as follows, through 1977: In Florida, 48 of the 268 Blacks who killed whites were sentenced to death; of the 111 whites who killed Blacks, none were sentenced to death. In Georgia, 37 of the 258 Blacks who killed whites were sentenced to death; of the 71 whites who killed Blacks, two were sentenced to death.

In Texas, 27 of the 344 Blacks who killed whites were sentenced to death, while of the 143 whites who killed Blacks, none were sentenced to death. And finally, in the northern state of Ohio, of the 173 Blacks who killed whites, 37 of them were sentenced to death, and of the 47 whites who killed Blacks, none were sentenced to death.

This time around, however, the Mass. Supreme Court ruled on narrow constitutional grounds. The law before them stipulated that if a defendant pleaded guilty to first-degree murder, he could not be executed, whereas he could be if he insisted on his right to a trial by jury. The Court ruled that this law chilled the defendant's constitutional right to be tried by a jury of his or her peers and was thus unconstitutional. The Court also struck down a constitutional amendment that had been passed in December 1982, which stated that no provision of the (Massachusetts) constitution "shall be construed as prohibiting the punishment of death."

But that was all expected; the law and the amendment were hastily and poorly written, and were passed hastily with little review, by a lame duck session of the Legislature.

What is harder to gauge is the intent of the Court. The narrow 4 to 3 ruling reflects the success former Gov. King had in appointing justices — two of whom, Lynch and Nolan, join in a dissenting opinion. But it seems that the four who joined in the majority decision — one of whom, O'Connor, a King appointee, may turn out to be Ed King's Earl Warren — may have exhibited their political acumen by not giving away their arguments to their opposition, and thus figuring the next capital punishment law will also be easily struck down.

Shedding some more light on South Africa

Recently, there has been a lot of misinformation on the topic of South African divestment. We, as members of the South African Divestment Committee (SADC), would like to clarify some of the details of the issue.

Yes, this University does support divestment. However, despite the fact that the Trustees have a policy of not investing in corporations operating in South Africa, it was recently discovered that in fact they had purchased stock in six such corporations. After this was brought to the attention of Treasurer Brand, he was obligated to sell all the stock, but only sold three. The Treasurer has refused to sell the remaining three stocks (worth approximately $177,000) because he disputes the sources used by the SADC which show the corporations' involvement in South Africa. At least two sources confirming the involvement of each corporation in South Africa have been furnished by the SADC. This, the SADC feels, is more than sufficient proof. However, despite their oversight, the Trustees do support divestment, as does the State of Massachusetts.

The international community has also shown its disapproval of the illegitimate South African white minority government's racial policies by excluding it from the United Nations. The international government also strongly communicated its intolerance of the repressive South African white regime by encouraging divestment. They understand the relationship between divestment and emancipation of black South Africans.

U.S. corporations comprise 25 percent of all foreign investment in South Africa. These investments are concentrated in areas vital to the maintenance of the apartheid economy and government. Ford and General Motors provide the South African military with vehicles despite a U.S. Commerce Department ban on the sale of any commodity to the South African military or police. At least one-third of IBM's business in South Africa is with the government.

Obviously, if these and other U.S. corporations were to pull out of South Africa, the present white government would be severely weakened and the possibility of downfall of the apartheid regime would be greatly enhanced.

This thesis is supported by the African National Congress, the group considered the legitimate voice of the black South Africans. Critics of the ANC point to a recent survey that states 75 percent of the black South Africans don't support divestment. This study is invalid. Not mentioned is the fact that it is illegal in South Africa to publicly support divestment. So, even if black South Africans want to support divestment, by admitting that they subject themselves to a possible minimum sentence of five years imprisonment and a maximum sentence of death. It is illegal to speak out against the government at all, and to do so is to be accused of high treason. So, in fact, the 25 percent of black South Africans who spoke in support of divestment risked imprisonment.

Opposers of divestment feel that black South Africans will suffer greatly because they won't have jobs after the U.S. corporations pull out. In fact, only 2 percent of the black population is employed by U.S. corporations. So, while the white community and government in South Africa is benefitting greatly from the presence of the U.S. corporations, black South Africans are not. The presence of those corporations does more harm than good to blacks by feeding the white government with money and resources which are used to enforce the racist policies.

Hopefully, this has cleared up some issues. The question now is not whether we should divest; that has already been answered by the Trustees of the University. The question is now when do we put an end to this racist apartheid regime?

MEXICO CITY — A Red Cross worker carries two injured children from the site of an explosion in Mexico City this morning that destroyed a residential area and set off a fire in a gas storage station. Nearly 100 died and hundreds were injured.

More involvement needed

By KIMBERLY A. BURGE
Collegian Staff

On Thursday most of us will be at home enjoying a delicious Thanksgiving dinner with our families. On the same day, hundreds of Ethiopians and other Africans will die of starvation.

Ethiopia was once the "Bread basket of Africa." Now it is nothing more than a vast desert. The land is no longer fertile enough to grow food and there hasn't been a good rainfall in three years.

Food can't be delivered to the villages because many of the roads are inaccessible and there is a shortage of trucks.

There is only one doctor to care for 365,000 people and be in charge of three distribution centers. Many of the victims are children and there aren't enough people around to give the children the attention they need.

Although people are encouraged to stay in their villages, many abandon their home and crowd the distribution centers in the hopes of receiving a regular food supply.

In a country where the supply of food is in abundance, it is hard to think about people starving to death. Yet, we should think about it because it is an important social issue and there is always the possibility that we could face the same thing in the United States.

However, thinking about it is not enough. Third World people should also become involved with decision making processes affecting Third World countries and play a more active role in influencing foreign policies because what happens in the Third World affects minorities in the United States either directly or indirectly.

The plight hampering the Third World would not end until peoples of color unite to destroy it.

Program raises Hispanics' nutritional consciousness

By YADIRA A. BETANCES
Collegian Staff

Attempting to make Hispanic women conscious about nutrition, and able to plan more balanced meals and budget their money, Northampton's Hampden County Extention Services has a home service program in Floreing Hights and Hampden Gardens Project housing.

Esther Orellana, a senior University of Massachusetts plant and soil science major visits low income Hispanic families with children and teaches them basic nutritional concepts, buying strategies, and the psychology of purchasing.

Orellana said Hispanics are not conscious about nutrition. "They need to be conscious that children have to be better fed. There need to be changes in nutrition for future generations," she said.

She said she does not try to change their dietary habits, but attempts to raise awareness of food and nutrition.

Hispanics do not consume enough vegetables due to the inability to obtain them, and their ignorance on the importance of vegetables and their vitamin C richness, she said.

ORELLANA, WHO TRANSFERED FROMLWorcester Center Extention Services, thinks the program is effective. "If I would not see any changes, it would worry me. But I make an impact and a difference."

She said 98 percent of the women who are solicited about the services accept them. "Hispanic women live very isolated from society. They are very proud of what they learn and how it expands their world."

Orellana also has a Friday morning snow in Concepto Latino on WMUA, where she discusses the importance of certain foods in a daily diet.

Orellana thinks students eat too much junk food. She recommends students not eat greasy, sugary or salty foods because they do not provide a consistent amount of energy. She said students should eat breakfast, sleep well, and exercise.

Campus cafeterias should cater to students' nutritional needs rather than fast food services, she said. There should be surveys done on what kinds of food students would like and dietitians hired to balance the menus. "If they were really concerned about students' health and nutrition, they would do it," she said.

Poetic drama:

In Life in the Fast Lane poet Lane Nishikawa examines the life of Japanese Americans.

By LORENA NOZZOLILLO
Collegian Correspondent

The New World Theatre's production of Life in the Fast Lane, a one-man dramatic presentation by poet Lane Nishikawa, is a poignant, often humorous account of life as a Japanese-American. Nishikawa, an Asian American poet and actor, candidly reveals his real life experiences as a Japanese American through dramatic readings of his poetry.

The play begins as Nishikawa arrives late for an interview. He begins a discussion with the non-existent interviewer, explaining his style of poetry. Nishikawa tells his interviewer, and the audience, that he writes in free verse, meaning that his poetry is free from restriction of any sort.

He also explains how a lot of his inspiration comes from people he has known throughout his life. For example, he tells the interviewer how he used to spend every summer with his grandmother in Hawaii. This leads into Nishikawa's reading of his poem "Oba Chan" (Japanese for grandmother).

Nishikawa slips into the persona of himself at a younger age, describing the relationship he shared with his grandmother as he was growing up. His grandmother is described as being traditionally Japanese; she fed him on Japanese cuisine and constantly lamented over Japan. She is his only link with his homeland.

Throughout the play, Nishikawa is constantly switching from himself to other personalities. One of the more humorous points of the show is when Nishikawa plays a bigot, a typical Jap hating, flag-hating World War II vet.

As the bigot, Nishikawa explains how he has raised three sturdy sons who have all grown up and "done him proud." Unfortunately, his daughter wound up getting pregnant by "one of those Japanese fellers. Roosevelt is probably turning in his grave." Nishikawa explains how bigotry is a constant, never-ending battle, and that no matter where you go you will find people with this type of attitude.

Nishikawa recites his poems in an exuberant fervor. At times he seems to be too caught up in his own excitement, and unfortunately his messages are lost in the rush.

Despite his fast delivery, his poems are contemporary, colorful and effectively reflect the attitudes of the Asian-american. Nishikawa saved his most humorous piece for last: a piece called "Japanese Junkies". This piece satirizes the media's exploitation of Japanese culture. Products with Japanese names "are hot on the media meat market" according to Nishikawa (e.g. James Michener's Shogun, John Belushi's Samurai skit).

Through his work, Nishikawa is fighting against the stereotypical image presented by the media. Through his skill as an actor and a poet, Nishikawa successfully shows how the Asian-American is searching for his place in American society.

On Tuesday, November 27, at 8 p.m., the University of Massachusetts Department of Music and Dance will present UMass/Amherst Jazz, a concert featuring eight highly-acclaimed faculty and guest artists. The program will include premieres of new pieces composed by Jeff Holmes, Salvatore Macchia and Frederick Tillis, as well as mainstream jazz selections performed by the Tradewinds Jazz Ensemble. Information may be obtained by calling 545-2227.

Oh God again

By MATT MACHERA and HERB RAMY
Collegian Correspondent

George Burns is back again in one of his most famous roles as God. Only this time he draws double duty as the Devil. The action begins when a struggling singer, played by Ted Wass, sells his soul to the Devil in return for wealth and fame. Eventu ally he realizes that he has made a mistake and then it's God to the rescue.

Director Paul Bogart does a fine job in directing Oh God, You Devil and avoids many of the problems in Oh God's sequel, Oh God, Book 2. This time the plot is much simpler and not as full of deep moral statements. The best feature of this movie is George Burns. If you thought he was the perfect God in the first two movies, then you'll be even more impressed with his portrayal of the Devil. Burns transforms the prince of darkness into a grandfather figure with evil tendencies.

As for the rest of the acting, it was fairly good. Ted Wass's character was humorous and believable, but so predictable that Burns stole the show.

The only problem a viewer might have with Oh God You Devil is if he/she takes it too seriously. Many of the scenes sacrifice a degree of believability in order to be funny.

Although this movie won't win any Academy Awards it does achieve its goal of making the viewer laugh. We can recommend this movie because it provides simple entertainment and you're almost guaranteed to leave the theater with a smile.

Wrestlers pin down Hartford

By BRYAN QUENZEL
Collegian Correspondent

In what was possibly the final home match in its history, the University of Massachusetts wrestling team went out strong with a 38-12 thrashing of the University of Hartford at the Boyden Gym on Saturday.

The wrestling team is one of seven sports being phased out of the University's varsity athletic program and since this was their only scheduled home match this season, the team does not expect to see the Boyden mats again.

The Minutemen overcame this and dominated a good Hartford squad. Coach Rick Freitas was very pleased with the performance of his young team.

"We have mostly freshman and they wrestled well in their first collegiate matches," Freitas said.

Freitas was impressed with the performances of two of his freshman, Tom Becci and Tom Pomella. Becci built a 16-3 lead through one and a half periods before the Hartford coach threw in the towel to end the match. Pomella took apart his opponent and pinned him just 40 seconds into the match.

Sophomore Chris Lee, ranked 10th in the nation among the NCAA division one 126 pound class, overcame an ankle injury which had kept him from practicing during the week to record a tough 9-8 victory. Lee scored the winning point with just 20 seconds left in the final period.

The Minutemen's next match is at the Coast Guard Invitational from November 30 to December 1.

Minuteman basketball opens '84-85 season looking to surprise

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

The 1984-85 University of Massachusetts men's basketball season will be a unique one for two reasons.

The first being that the Minutemen will play all 12 home games in the Springfield Civic Center away from one of the worst places for an opposing team to play, the Curry Hicks Cage which is undergoing $2.5 million in renovations.

The second reason is that coach Ron Gerlufsen has elected, without much choice, to go into the season without a center.

In the pre-season Atlantic 10 coach's poll, the Minutemen were selected to come in last in the ten team conference. With the loss of center Edwin Green to graduation and its high scorer of the last two seasons in John Hempel (transferred to St. John's) also missing, no one expects much of UMass.

But second year coach Ron Gerlufsen, who guided UMass to a 12-17 record last season, looks at the Minutemen and sees a strong backcourt, one of the best forwards in the conference and solid depth.

"It's easy to look at Edwin and John being gone and expect us to come in last," Gerlufsen said. "But people don't realize that Edwin only scored 13 points a game and that John only won two games for us with his shooting. We're going to surprise a lot of people."

The Minutemen open with Division 2 power Stonehill College next Monday at the Civic Center (7:30 p.m.). They go on the road to New Hampshire, Connecticut and Hartford before hosting Boston University and Northeastern. The initial few games will tell a lot about what kind of team UMass will have.

"It's important to win every game," Gerlufsen said. "But it's doubly important to get off to a good start. If we want the best fans in the league, that's our fans, to come out to Springfield and see us, we have to be exciting to watch and be winners. I think we can be both."

Three starters return from last season's eighth place A-10 finisher, a team that was within a game of fifth place before dropping four straight before the league tournament.

Senior co-captain Horace Neysmith will fill one forward position and brings impressive credentials to it.

The 6-5, 218 pounder scored 13.2 points a game last season with a .595 shooting percentage. Neysmith pulled down a team high 7.6 rebounds per contest (third in the conference) and behind Geroge Washington star Mike Brown is the top returning boardman in the conference.

"Horace is our mainstay upfront," Gerlufsen said. "He's a smart player, shoots well and plays tough defense. I expect a lot out of him, he has to produce for us to do well."

The other two returnees team in the backcourt. Senior co-captain Donald Russell and sophomore Carl Smith are with little question the strength of the team.

Russell will fill the shooters role and has averaged over 11 points in his three years at UMass (11.8 last season). The 6-1 veteran will have to help fill the slack left by the departure of Hempel and Green with more consistent outside (10 to 15 feet) shooting.

Smith, who set the league and school records with 212 assists last season, singlehandedly won four games last season with last-second heroics. He averaged only 7.2 points and will need to get around a dozen a game to contribute to the offense. The 5-11 speedster made the all-rookie team last season in the league.

"Carl and Donald are keys to both the offense and defense," Gerlufsen said. "Both are very quick and have vital roles. I want to see them score some more points and continue the good defense they've shown in the past. I'm not worried about them."

Gerlufsen is, however, worried about the other two forward spots. Senior Bobby Braun looks like a lock for the power forward position and with his 6-6, 220 pound frame he'll bang more than a few people around this season. Junior Tom Emerson and Senior George Ramming saw little quality time last season and will back up Braun in that spot along with freshman Tom Swick, a Canadian import with good tools but little experience.

"All four of those guys are big guys who need to rebound and play defense, what Edwin did," Gerlufsen said. "I will use them all a lot, I hope, and need around ten points from that position. But rebounding is the key for these guys; I'm looking for defensive board help."

The small forward spotis a dogfight. Senior Ron Young (6-4) only scored 25 points last season but has good defensive abilities and is showing confidence. Freshman Wilbur Hicks has the height (6-7) and the touch (23.2 average in high school), but lacks experience.

"He needs control on the court, but he works hard and has good habits and rebounding ability," Gerlufsen assessed.

Sophomore Darryl Carter is back from a year off and the explosive 6-5 swingman will probably be Gerlufsen's offense off the bench.

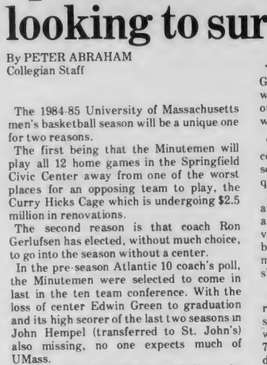
"These guys will all play a lot," Gerlufsen said. "I'm going to see what kind of team we're playing and if we need speed, Braun might not play and Carter will see time, if we need size you might see Braun and Ramming in there. The situation will dictate who plays at the forwards. Horace will see small forward time as well."

Freshman Matt Ryan and Lorenzo Sutton will see backcourt time, but both need seasoning. Carter will back up Smith at the point.

On offense the Minutemen will look for the easy shot and avoid the off-balance jumpers that Hempel favored that lead to the opponent getting a fast break.

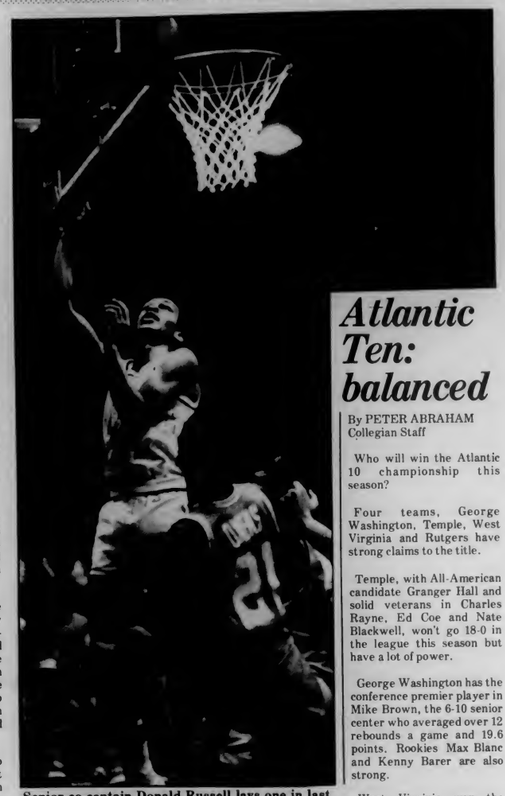
Defensively with the depth in the backcourt, the Minutemen will look to employ a lot of defensive pressure externally and press a lot.

"The defense will set up the offense," Gerlufsen said. "We are pretty quick and creative on the open floor. We can shoot, pass, rebound and play defense. We are just small."



Sports information photos

Point guard Carl Smith will lead the Minuteman offense this season. The sophomore had a school record 212 assists last season.



Senior co-captain Donald Russell lays one in last season against URI. The Minutemen open up next Monday with Stonehill.

Atlantic Ten: balanced

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

Who will win the Atlantic 10 championship this season?

Four teams, George Washington, Temple, West Virginia and Rutgers have strong claims to the title.

Temple, with All-American candidate Granger Hall and solid veterans in Charles Rayne, Ed Coe and Nate Blackwell, won't go 18-0 in the league this season but have a lot of power.

George Washington has the conference premier player in Mike Brown, the 6-10 senior center who averaged over 12 rebounds a game and 19.6 points. Rookies Max Blanc and Kenny Barer are also strong.

West Virginia won the conference tournament last season and have dunk-master Lester Rowe back. Rutgers didn't lose a letterman and All-American candidate John "Get Ready For" Battle is outstanding.

St. Joseph's lost tough Tony Costner in the pivot, but returns the smooth Maurice Martin and Bob Lojewski.

St. Bonaventure has rookie-of-the-year Alvin Lott and bruising forward Barry Mungar. Duquesne had a good team, but a rape charge has sacked four players including all-conference pick Emmett Sellers.

Rhode Island has a new coach in Brandan Malone and little else. This was probably the Ram's year in football anyway.

The league will feature a 45 second clock and a short 19'-9" three point zone. All ten teams will qualify for the Atlantic 10 tournament at Rutgers.

Of course, don't forget Penn State. The Nittany Lions lost three starters from a 5-22 team. Another football school with little hope for hoop success.

Player of the year honors will go to either Martin, Battle or Brown.

Sheehan injured

Jack Sheehan seems destined to never play in December for the University of Massachusetts.

After sitting out last season's opening month after transferring from Rider College, the junior will miss at least until January with a stress fracture of the back.

"Jack's injury is hard to tell," coach Ron Gerlufsen said. "It may take three weeks or three months to heal."

The 6-3 reserve point guard averaged less than a point last season but played well when in the game. Small forward Darryl Carter is at guard in his absence.

Blue Wall performer fired

By IAN POLUMBAUM
Collegian Staff

Blue Wall entertainer Cliff Myers has been fired from his job performing at Friday afternoon "happy hours," Campus Center Director William Harris said yesterday.

Myers, 33, of Warwick, R.I., had come under fire from the Campus Center Board of Governors (BOG) and the Collegian editorial board for making what the BOG and the editors considered racist and sexist jokes during two recent shows.

On Nov. 9, Myers reportedly pointed to a Portuguese woman in the audience and suggested that someone "get a pool table," a reference to a 1983 new Bedford case in which four Portuguese men were convicted of raping a woman on a pool table while patrons of Big Dan's Tavern urged them on.

The BOG last week wrote letters to Myers and to Campus Center Food Services Director Richard Ellis, who handled Myers' contract, calling the remark "unacceptable."

BOG vice-chairwoman Karen-Karina Gray said Myers apologized at the beginning of his show last Friday after meeting with board members, then invited a black man to dance on stage, saying, "everybody knows black people can dance."

"I deplore any kind of rape, racism or anything that will put people against people."

—Cliff Myers

"There should be no second chance for people to utter racist and sexist remarks," the Collegian said in an editorial Monday.

"Somebody misconstrued something I said," Myers told the Associated Press Monday night. "All I ever intended was light hearted fun."

"I deplore any kind of rape, racism or anything that will put people against people...one of my purposes in life is to bring people together," he said.

"His contract has been terminated," Harris said, "This university has a history of being sensitive to the feelings of other cultures, all cultures. It would be inappropriate for us from a professional or social standpoint to tolerate it (the comedian's behavior). It is against the professional standpoint of the Campus Center."

Myers had performed regularly at Blue Wall happy hours for four years. "He was our biggest pull," Campus Center Beverage Manager William Elmore said. "They love him."

Pilgrim, turkey myths debunked

Thanksgiving not solely religious

By NANCY A. BUKAR
Collegian Staff

Most people might think of Thanksgiving as a solely religious holiday, a time to give thanks for a fruitful harvest. An image of solemn Pilgrims sharing the benefits of their hard work with neighboring Indians comes to mind.

Wrong.

"I can still visualize in my grade school calendar where you'd have the Indians and the Pilgrims sitting around a table sharing their food. I don't think it was like that. It was probably much more fun than that picture portrays," said anthropology professor George J. Armelagos.

The Pilgrims themselves described Thanksgiving as a time for rejoicing and celebrating, Armelagos said, while the religious concepts were introduced later in the century.

The Pilgrims' other holidays were serious and solemn, with little room for rejoicing. "You couldn't go out and throw rocks (weights, as they were called) or play games like cricket. You weren't allowed to do that and I think that was one of the reasons for not making Thanksgiving a religious holiday. They'd have some fun on Thanksgiving, doing what they wanted to do," Armelagos said.

Thanksgiving began as an English holiday called 'Harvest Home'. "After the first harvest they would have a celebration that would last a week," he said, "and it was a very secular holiday."

Food remains the center of attention for Thanksgiving, Armelagos said the Pilgrims came to America too late in the year to plant a crop and the next year was a hungry one. After their first harvest, they celebrated with a feast. There was no specific mention of a turkey being eaten, but the Pilgrims did eat fowl and the Indians supplied the venison.

"I think that without the Indians, that first Thanksgiving would not have been possible. We tend to forget how important the American Indian foods were for the colonists," Armelagos said.

According to Professor Dena Dincauze of the anthropology department, the Indians who attended the first Thanksgiving feasts were not from Plymouth, but from adjacent areas.

"In 1620, when the Pilgrims came to Plymouth Harbor, there were no Indians living there at all," she said. The Indains from the area who did attend the feast were "uneasy allies" of the Pilgrims.

"During the first year, the Pilgrims and the Indians in the region regarded each other with mutual suspicion. Each group, for it's own reasons, made overtures to the others, resulting in some visiting back and forth in which a mutual trust was established," Dincauze said.

The relationships between the Pilgrims and the Indians never reached a happy medium. "Some bitterness was probably always there and it surfaces every Thanksgiving," she said.

Nonetheless, Thanksgiving has remained a tradition in this country for 360 years, with food remaining the central issue for most hungry college students and family members alike.

Turkeys not as dumb as people think

By RENEE BACHER
Collegian Staff

Although turkeys have acquired a reputation for being stupid, the myth that turkeys have been known to drown while looking at the sky on a rainy day is clearly false, according to professor of veterinary and animal science, J. Robert Smyth.

Compared to chickens, turkeys are quite intelligent and in the royal courts of Europe, they were once popular pets, Smyth said. In the wild, they are good at finding the best grass and clover to eat. Modern turkeys do not resemble wild and ornamental breeds, Smyth said, since modern turkeys are raised with white feathers which make a "prettier carcass."

Out of their natural habitat, turkeys have been known to commit some ridiculous acts—you might say downright silly, Smyth said. Young turkeys left alone with an open container will crowd into it until they suffocate, Smyth added.

According to Sam Pardue, post-doctoral student in veterinary and animal sciences, turkey became

Valuable bronze bust recovered by students

A $50,000 bronze bust of the first University of Massachusetts president was recovered Moday, after it was stolen from the Whitmore Administration Building sometime Thursday, UMass police reported.

Police said the statue was stolen from an enclosed area at the center of Whitmore Thurdsay, and the theft was immediately reported to the police. The bust was found Monday, undamaged in bushes near the Orchard Hill Observatory, by students. Police said they have no suspects in the theft.

A resident of Coolidge reported $200 in cash stolen from an unlocked room on the 13th floor Monday, police said. Police said they have no suspects in the theft.

McDonald's celebrates its 50 billionth hamburger sale

NEW YORK (AP)—McDonald's celebrated a McMilestone on Tuesday, flipping a Quarter Pounder onto a grill at a swank New York hotel and designating it the 50 billionth burger sold by the global fast-food empire.

"This has got to be the most important hamburger ever cooked," McDonald's USA President Edward H. Rensi said during a slick multimedia presentation.

A drum roll resounded as Rensi donned an apron, walked onstage and placed the meat patty on the grill.

Educators and scholars attack "timidity" of teen-age schooling

WASHINGTON (AP)—A group of educators and scholars, alarmed at soaring rates of teen-age homicides, suicides and out-of-wedlock births, Tuesday attacked what it called the "timidity" of schools in instilling good character traits in the young.

The 27 academics, school officials and policy-makers, including several prominent conservatives, warned in a "Thanksgiving Statement" that "schools in general are not doing enough to counter the symptoms of serious decline in youth character."

They said the recent spate of school reform reports "have bypassed the critical issue of youth character," and they offered an array of suggestions for rectifying that omission, from putting more emphasis on school ceremonies to allowing non-teachers with leadership qualities to become principals.

House passes Walpole name change

BOSTON (AP)—Hardened criminals won't have to worry about getting sent to Walpole state prison, if the Massachusetts House has its way. Instead, they'll be sent to "Cedar Junction."

The House, with several members laughing, quickly approved a bill Tuesday that would the name of Massachusetts Correctional Institution at Walpole to MCI—Cedar Junction.

Despite the name change, the 27-year-old prison won't be moving.

Residents of the suburb south of Boston said they are resigned to having the state's only maximum security prison in their midst. But they hoped the simple name change will improve the image of their community and avoid jokes about the criminal element in their town.

the traditional Thanksgiving meal because the bird was one of the few animals native to the area when the Pilgrims arrived from Europe.

Like the guinea pig and the llama, turkeys were indiginous to the Americas and eventually domesticated. "The Indians were eating them too," said Smyth.

Today, domestic turkeys are bred to have more meat than wild turkeys do. The turkey is bred through genetic selection to have a very large breast, which is more pleasing to consumers, Smyth said.

As a result of this large breast, male turkeys are unable to mate naturally. "Frequently the turkey toms cannot mate, or they are very poor at it. Thet just topple over, said Pardue.

In the past twenty years domestic turkeys have also been produced by artificial insemination, according to Pardue.

Robotics Lab founder dies

Associate ECE professor succumbs at 32

By ANNE McCRORY
Collegian Staff

Howard Elliot, and associate professor of electrical and computer engineering (ECE) at the University of Massachusetts and recent recipient of the Presidential Young Investigators award, died Monday at University Hospital, Boston, after a lingering illness. He was 32.

Elliot, who came to the University in August 1982, worked in the areas of adaptive control, image processing and robotics. He was co-founder and co-director of the Labotatory for Perceptual Robotics, where his research concentrated on controlling the movements of a robot using electrical engineering techniques.

He was also integral in obtaining government and industrial funding for the work, according to computer and information science professor Michael Arbib, co-director of the robotics lab

"He was one of the rising stars of the University," Arbib said yesterday of his collegue. "The chance of finding someone who can work in all the areas he's worked in and work in them effectively is unlikely."

Associate professor Haluk Derin, another research collegue, said, "he was a very strong character and a very strong leader type."

Elliot received his bachelor of science, bachelor of arts, masters of science, and doctoral degrees from Brown University.

He is survived by his wife, Charlotte Anne (Spell); his parents, Theodore and Ruth (Diemont) of Quincy and two brothers, Nathan D. of Randolph, and James M. Elliot of Stoughton.

Funeral services will be held at 2 p.m. today in the Levine-Bliss Funeral Home, Randolph. At UMass, a memorial service will be held at 4 p.m. Monday in the Memorial Room of Memorial Hall.

Burial will be held in the Sharon Memorial Park, Sharon.

Letters to the Editor

Cliff Myers and humor

Myers educates...

In response to Monday's Collegian editorial, "Enough is enough" and the cartoon also on the page, yes, I agree with the newspaper on the point that what Cliff Myers says during his shows at the Blue Wall could be considered racist and sexist. But, what I want to know is, when is the Collegian staff going to wake up and smell the roses? I mean when are the people at the Collegian going to realize that people interpret what people say differntly from how the Collegian interprets them?

Doesn't the Collegian know that people educate others about oppression in different ways. That maybe Cliff Myer's joking about these oppressions and the stereotypes that go with them are his way of saying how stereotypes can hurt people. But, will the students of UMass ever know why Cliff Myers makes these remarks?

Another problem I found in the paper that day, and on the same page was the cartoon by Tom Haley. Where does Haley get the right to depict Cliff Meyers as a member of the Ku Klux Klan? Did Haley ask Cliff if he was a member? I found this cartoon to be very racist, the same way the Collegian finds Cliff Myers comments during his shows to be racist.

It's barroom fun...

Hey, enough is enough! Yes, that's right, this is a response to the unsigned editorial in the Monday, Nov. 15, Collegian. I'd say it's time the Cliff Myers issue is put to rest. He's no worse than any other barroom entertainer, especially no ruder. Happy Hour at the Blue Wall on Friday afternoons is almost standing room only. Most of that can be attributed to the popularity of Myers' show. People like myself, are entertained by his show. If a few people are offended, I totally agree with Myers insofar that they should find something else to do instead of coming to his show.

Granted, there is such a thing as good and bad taste in humor. Many comedians and/or musicians are known to be fairly rude during their performances. This has been this way since the beginning, and always will be. They are able to continue on as usual with business. Myers isn't nearly as bad as some of his colleagues can be. Maybe he's just a little hyper at times. Relatively speaking, the Blue Wall should be content with the fact that they can get such a crowd gatherer who isn't as vulgar as other entertainers.

I do think it is important to step back for a moment and answer an important question. What is the Blue Wall? It's a bar. Bars are generally rowdy, racy, and even alittle rough around the edges. The Blue Wall is conducting business just as any other establishment. They employ an entertainer who brings on customers. The customers are amused, and come back week after week. Where's the problem? I, and plenty more don't see a problem. If someone's sense of humor is rigid enough to the point of being offended then he/she really shouldn't direct his/her attention to Happy Hour at the Blue Wall. The TOC Lounge has Happy Hour, too. Consider it an alternative.

With all kidding aside, let's not end this issue too soon. We'll only have to find something else to complain about. Heaven help us, we may end up with the sexist mascot issue again.

Peter J. DePuy

Enough is enough is...

I would like to address the subject matter of the Collegian editorial letter titled "Enough is Enough".

I would like to explain a certain principle to the Collegian Board of Editors about performance and original dramatic or humorous material. When a comedian tells a joke (now listen carefully) he is not serious. He is actually making fun of the persona he portrays. In saying nasty things, he is showing how ridiculous he knows the statement to be. He knows (or thinks he knows) that the audience recognizes his parody of a ridiculous stereotype or his comic imitation of a real, serious racist when he makes one.

Still, maybe silencing "rude" and "unacceptable" performers like Mr. Meyers is a good idea. But why stop there? Why not go the distance and condemn other unfunny trouble-makers like George Carlin, Richard Pryor, Robin Williams, Billy Crystal and especially the late Lenny Bruce? What about Saturday Night Live, Second City TV, Gone with the Wind and many contemporary films, TV shows and songs? After all, we know that when Randy Newman sung about "Short People" he really meant it. Shakespeare's stuff is sexist — out with it! Then the nation will be secure for good, pre-chewed, censored, time-tested jokes that don't mention any sensative subjects. Sensitive subjects like racism, sexism and homophobia are best left unmentioned. Heaven forbid we should talk about them and learn to laugh at how ridiculous they are.

Now for all of you objecting to this theory, it is called sarcasm. In other words, I was not serious — it was a joke.

In all seriousness, I am not afraid to sign this letter. I am an activist and a liberal. I strongly believe in that black man's rights, as well as the Portuguese person's rights, but I also believe in Mr. Meyer's rights to perform what he, and evidently many, think is funny. Perhaps some of the hyperactive liberal reactionaries could concentrate their efforts on something meaningful, such as peace and hunger (yes, spend your happy-hour cover charge toward charity) instead of picking on some young comic.

Morals, morals and a few more

Oh, those tiresome morals! Morals were fine when they sought justice, mercy and recompense. But then some oppressive soul goes and adds personal righteousness to their social program. We ask: what right do they have? What authority? What chutzpah!

Well, I'm glad we asked those questions, because I'm just itching to answer them.

Rusty Denton

Let us remember that the Constitution was written with certain ends in mind: personal freedom; autonomous governments for churches and state (not opposite, autonomous); freedom of speech; free enterprise; biblical ethics.

Popular wisdom says most Americans agree with those biblical principles, i.e, Judeo-Christian teaching. The fact is, most Americans would be outraged if they knew what the Bible really says about their greed and prejudice, selfishness, and apathy. But for at least the first century after the Constitution, the competent practitioner of law needed to understand the Bible. Why? Because our moral structure was based on a sovereign God who does not change,to Whom we are supremely answerable.

These days, the Bible is a controversial book. If you don't accept all of its assertions, you probably accept only half of them, maybe less. Chances are, your view takes the God of the Bible with a grain of salt. You probably also believe that people are basically good.

So let's consider for a minute a morality that's not God-centered. Let's think about "others-centered" morality. How noble, to always consider the rights of others first. Does that mean murderers, rapists, and extortionists will continue to go scot-free because of legal technicalities that abridge their right to raise hell? Mercy without justice could kill you.

So maybe morals should be "community-centered," built around the public good. That sounds suspiciously political to me. Do tell me — how many people have been oppressed for daring to question the mighty public mind?

Let's face it: most of us don't want to be accountable to anybody. We have "self-centered" morality. Will this protect us from broken families or broken heads or broken hearts? I don't think so.

Maybe God-centered morality wasn't so bad. Time was, when Alexander de Tocqueville could say America was great because she was good...but only because she was good. Whatever else you may think, you must admit that some Providence has made this one of the richest countries in the world. But now we thanklessly grub for success without sweat, rights without responsibilities. Maybe it's time to moralize. Individual opinions on morality are pretty arbitrary, but I'll share my humble thoughts.

First, there's false morality. It's self-righteous and insensitive, with an ugly habit of waiting in the dark for those mortals who disagree. You wouldn't want to live next door to false morality.

And then there's true morality. It isn't vile, it doesn't bite; true morality doesn't consider itself the policeman of the world. But it doesn't have much fear, either. Often it opposes the crowd. Crowds like the Holocaust, the Inquisition; like prejudice and violence. You may not agree with it. It may not agree with you. But true morality will risk its life to save yours. I like that.

I may speak out in the name of the Lord against your driving habits, your politics, your business practices, your drinking or drugs, or even your sexuality. But I would give my life to protect you the way my Lord gave His for me. Is that oppression?

'Sick and appalled' by column

I am writing this in response to Stephen Erickson's article, "Education Before Action". (Collegian Nov. 15).

I was so sick and appalled with his naive and pathetic attempts to defend U.S. investments in South Africa that I wondered who he was trying to fool.

I understand what his position and feelings are vis a vis Apartheid.

Ramin Zahed interviews author and editor T.E.D. Klein

By COUNT RAMIN ZAHED
Collegian Staff

"I don't leave home on three occasions; Halloween, Independence Day, and Christmas," confessed T.E.D. Klein, editor of Twilight Zone magazine and best-selling fantasy writer. Talking from his house in New York, Mr. Klein discussed the birth of his magazine, his works, and the success of the classic series The Twilight Zone.

Klein, a native New Yorker, worked as story editor for Paramount Pictures upon graduating from Columbia University's Film School. His fascination with magic and fantasy, which had given him restless nights as a child, enabled him to create enchanting stories and situations. Finally, in 1981, he put together the proposal for the publication of the magazine. Since then, he has suceeded in keeping Twilight Zone fans satisfied by publishing one telescript in each issue as well as new tales of fiction and information about upcoming fantasy films. It should be noted that the consulting editor of the magazine is no other than Carol Serling, the widow of the late Rod Serling.

According to Klein the magazine, which is celebrating its fourth anniversary in February, emphasizes more on magic rather than science fiction. He said each issue has one or two stories by new writers chosen from the hundreds of manuscripts sent to the editors.

The magazine has also launched its first trivia contest on 100 college campuses including the University of Massachusetts. Posters pertaining to this contest should be visible on campus this month.

Klein advised the young fantasy writer to be specific and concrete, "to make the reader see, hear, and smell." He also suggested reading all kinds of literature. He said, "I have to confess; when I go home, I read ordinary books; Updike, Orwell, Virginia Woolf."

Klein also spoke of a new Twilight Zone series which will be produced by CBS in the fall of 1985. he was very excited about the film version of Dune and thought it to be an excellent visual adaptation.

His new best-selling book The Ceremonies is the story of two innocent young people who perform black magic ceremonies under the influence of a satanic old man. Klein sees this work as a tribute to the Welsh writer Arthur Machem.

Klein is currently working on a collection of short stories set in modern day New York. With a slight note of mischief in his voice, he said, "The secret is to put horror in average everyday situations.

The Ceremonies

The concept of ritual paganism, originating from the druidical rites of the first millenium, has been a source of great fascination for many of us. It has inspired a wealth of artists, fromStravinsky to Ernst to Lovecraft. T.E.D. Klein, editor of Twilight Zone Magazine has been infused with a similar spirit, as is shown by his recent book, The Ceremonies.

A modern gothic, The Ceremonies tells of two young innocents who are manipulated into assisting a very old man who is resurrecting an ancient evil whose arrival will precipitate the destruction of the world.

The action is set in two locals—bustling New York City where the protagonists live, and a puritanical religious community in New Jersey where they vacation. Since the scenes are so close to home, they are all the more believable.

The Ceremonies is for Northeasterners what The Wicker Man was for British readers. The prime difference between the two books is that, while in The Wicker Man the menace is not manifest until the end, The Ceremonies is unable to maintain any degree of subtlety.

Klein will drop a hint at the beginning of each chapter and fully expose it by its end. It seems as though he is afraid the reader will figure out too much unassisted, and he must therefore constantly blurt out explanations to demonstrate his cleverness. Klein has picked up a lot from fanatasist Arthur Machen, but has neglected Dickens' strategy of harboring clues (In Bleak House a letter is hurriedly burned on page seven. We don't know why until 500 pages later).

Nevertheless, Ceremonies is a fun book. Klein has boned up on the classic gothics and on George (Golden Bough) Fraser, which makes for a grand entertainment. Like Stephen King, Klein is extremely redable; but, like King, he is without artistic pretensions.

Men's volleyball impresses

By JOHN A. NOLAN
Collegian Staff

For a team that arrived late, was denied warmup time, missed its coach and competed in its first tournament in three years, the UMass men's volleyball team impressed a more experienced field despite dropping six of eight games, at the Boston University Invitational.

"In our first four games we tried to do much more than was expected, and it showed," said co-captain Dave Simeone. "But I was told by a lot of coaches that we're going to have a dynamite team, and after our final four games, I have to agree."

The initial four games served UMass with a rude awakening to the competitive demands of organized volleyball. Without benefit of the necessary pre-game warmups, the Minutemen immediately found themselves on the short end of a disappointing 15-13 loss to a team made up of members of the U.S. Volleyball Association. With the initial disappointment followed three more losses, including two to an experienced Wentworth College squad, largely attributed to the absence of Coach Pat Ryan.

However, with the afternoon arrival of Ryan, the team really began to impress. After dropping a game to Tufts, the spikers came back to produce a strong 15-9 victory behind the leadership of Simeone and co-captain Juan Maldonado.

Entering the final two games, their Invitational palyoff chances eliminated, UMass found itself in a battle for pride against another U.S.V.B.A. squad from the Cambridge YMCA.

In the tournament's most exciting game, UMass seemed to find its cohesion as the defense continuously dug out the powerful hits of the YMCA squad. The Minutemen pulled out a 17-15 thriller. Cambridge won the second game 15-12.

Improved women's basketball should contend in conference

Bernier and Hebel expected to lead UMass

By JOHN A. NOLAN
Collegian Staff

The drought is over.

With the 1984-5 women's basketball season getting under way Saturday versus Boston College, coach Barbara Stevens expects her squad to blossom into an exciting ballclub with the addition of several key newcomers.

Coming off last year's 10-17 mark, a campaign that saw a late season collapse when UMass dropped 13 of its final 16 games, Stevens is eager to let the reigns loose on her youthful squad in anticipation of so an exciting brand of runaway, racehorse basketball.

"I don't think anyone will see us sit back," Stevens said. "We're a fast break team on both ends of the floor, so we're expecting to push the ball at our opponents."

In accordance with this year's wave of youth dominated women's athletics at UMass, Stevens' crew adds six freshmen to a veteran team.

"We're a young team with no seniors," Stevens said, "But our newcomers will compliment our veterans, adding needed depth."

But as with every young team, it will be the veterans that will be looked upon to form the nucleus of the ballclub. Returning from last year is captain Jerrie Bernier along with Barbara Hebel, Karen Damminger, Rebecca Kucks, Kelly Collins, Karen Fitzgerald and Mary Marquedant.

Junior captain Jerrie Bernier, shown here in action last year against Springfield, directs the show for UMass

As possibly the Atlantic 10's smallest team, the Minutemen must look to an experienced front line, one that Stevens fears still needs help.

"Size is still a weakness for us," the second year coach said. "We've been working on our rebounding, but we have to make sure that our inside is strong."

"For us to be competitive, we'll need at least one or two of our forwards to score in double figures."

However, for a team lacking height, the Minutemen are blessed with speed and quickness at the forward position with Bernier leading the group. Bernier returns as the team's leading rebounder and floor leader and is a tough player who works hard for every basket.

Bernier is joined up front by the 5-9 Kucks, a defensive sparkplug who led the team, along with 1984 graduate Wendy Ward, in steals.

"Rebecca is our unsung hero," Stevens said. "Every team has a player that goes about her job with little notoriety, but she's worth her weight in gold."

An A-10 all rookie freshman year, Damminger, 5-11, comes off a disappointing sophomore year but is expected to return to form this season. Also expected to see a lot of action this year will be 6-1 junior Kelly Collins and freshman Susan Burtoft. Collins sat out last season due to and early season injury while Burtoft has been aggressive.

Anchoring the middle should be Karen Fitzgerald, a 6-2 sophomore who led the team in scoring and rebounding five times last year.

"Karen came around towards the end of last season," Stevens said. "She's just going to have to work on developing her intensity."

One area that doesn't worry Stevens is the guard position where the team is loaded. Gone is point guard Wendy Ward, the Minutemen's fourth all-time scorer. Her absence will be missed. However, Stevens sees JoAnn Dupuis, a 5-5 sophomore transfer from Montreal, Canada, filling the spot without much difficulty.

Barbara Hebel, sixth in A-10 conference scoring last year with 16.1 points per game, returns as the offensive force UMass will look to put points on the board. The junior second team all-conference pick last year should benefit from the team's added punch.

"I expect to see as good if not better scoring from her," Stevens said. "Last year when it was obvious that she was our scorer, the team got shut down as opposing defenses converged upon her."

Along with sophomore returnee, Mary Marguendant, the Minutemen look to a large group of freshmen recruits to add new scoring punch and increase overall team depth. The freshman contingent is headed by Tara Lewis and Juanita Matthews, a pair of explosive offensive weapons Stevens sees as players of the future. Lewis is a pre-season all rookie team member.

"Tara can put points on the board in a hurry. I think she can become one of the best we've ever had," Stevens said. "Juanita posesses all the moves, but if she were to have one thing she has to work on it would be her defense."

Sports Information photos

UMass guard Barbara Hebel calls out the play in action last season. The junior was sixth in the Atlantic 10 in scoring.

Also expected to see a lot of playing time are freshmen Laura Boucher and Cheryl Spakauskas. Both players have shown improvement and are expected to come off the bench to contribute when called upon.

In all, Stevens sees the team as having a vast amount of speed and ballhandling ability. With the added depth coming off the strong recruiting year, she sees the team as one that will feature all 13 players, whether starting or coming off the bench.

"I can see games in which most everybody will play," Stevens said. "I plan to use the entire bench, as long as everyone understands their role on the team, I can see myself going with all 13."

Entering the season, UMass is picked to finish sixth in the A-10. It is, however, a position Stevens relishes.

"I like the idea that we aren't really expected (to be) in the top four. This year we are an unknown quantity," said Stevens. "We aren't the same team as last year. I think we're going to surprise a lot of people this year because I don't think a lot of teams are expecting much from us."

Final Four notebook

Spence sparked UMass in NC

By GERRY DESIMAS
Collegian Staff

Consolation games are very hard to get up for after a draining semi-final struggle. "They are sort of meaningless," University of California women's soccer coach Bill Farrell said after his Bears were trounced by UMass 4-1 at the Final Four in Chapel Hill, North Carolina.

The spark plug for the 14-3-2 Minutemen was freshman Cathy Spence, who started just the second game of her college career.

"I found out three minutes before the game (that she would start)," Spence said. "I was really nervous." She started for Kristen Bowsher who had a muscle bruise.

It didn't affect the freshman from Hartford, who started in the Boston College playoff game, and she responded with a hat trick. Two goals came after Spence sent the ball past UCal goalie Mary Harvey, who has come out of the goal to challenge Spence.

Spence's third goal came with 19 minutes to go in the game on a Carolyn Micheel corner kick. Harvey tried to punch the ball out of the area, missed, and Spence banged the ball into the net.

"Even though we lost yesterday (Saturday to UConn 2-1 in double overtime), we came back to do what we had to do," Spence said. "We were proud." Spence scored the only UMass goal in the loss to UConn.

"She's instant offense off the bench," UMass coach Kalekeni Banda said. "If we want an assist or a goal, we put Cathy in. She makes things happen."

Spence finished the year as the team's second leading scorer behind freshman Jolie DePauw (33 pts.). Spence has 11 goals and eight assists for 30 points.

Spence also set the NCAA women's soccer tournament marks with most goals in a single game (3 vs. UCal), most goals in a tourney (5, one against BC, UConn and three vs. UCal) and most points in a tournament (11 pts, five goals, one assist (Harvard)).

Despite these record setting performances, Spence was not named to the All-Tournament team but fellow freshman DePauw, Corolyn Micheel, and Kristen Bowsher along with junior Sue Bird were named.

UMass' four picks was topped by four-time National champion North Carolina with five selections, including the outstanding player of the tournament, April Heinrichs. Spence broke Heinrich's records in each case.

Sunday's final drew 3,500 fans to Fetzer Field while Saturday's UNC game drew 1,700 despite the UNC-Virginia football game going on nearby. The UMass-UConn game drew 350 fans.

Native Americans protest Thanksgiving

By CHARLES FRANCIS CARROLL
Collegian Staff

PLYMOUTH — While many American families celebrated Thanksgiving with the traditional turkey dinner last week, others observed a national Day of Mourning.

For the 15th consecutive year, Native Americans came here to protest the plight of Indians and the plight of humanity. More than 200 people gathered around the statue of Massasoit located directly above Plymouth Rock on Thanksgiving Day.

Buddhist chanting and somber Native American drumming set the mood of the protest.

One Indian chief charged that some of their own people are even selling out to the government and selling Indian lands. Others charged that the government is seizing the land through manipulation of treaties and laws. An example used was the town of Gay Head at the southern tip of the Cape, which was taken from the tribe who lived there just a hundred years ago.

"Ten years ago the Wampanaog Tribal Council was incorporated, and, if you look at its charter at the office of the Secretary of State, they are defined as a cultural group designed to disseminate information of interest to the tribal," tribal spokesman Frank James said.

However, the Tribal Council, Inc., has recently signed a settlement with the government on behalf of the tribe in the tribe's land claim. The Tribal Council, inc., has accepted 440 acres. The settlement must still be ratified by both the Massachusetts Legislature and the U.S. Congress which will be discussed in the State House this week.

More than 100 tribal members dissent with the Tribal Council, Inc. They argue that the tribe should receive all 3,400 original acres which now comprise the town of Gay Head. "This is a great land rip-off," accused James.

Change aims to meet student need

$2.5m Curry Hicks Cage renovations ready in one year

By LESLEY CLARK
Collegian Staff

The 53-year-old Curry Hicks Cage, which has never been renovated, will have a new floor and additional space on 9,000 square feet of the south side of the building by next fall.

The $2.5 million renovations are being financed by a loan to the University Building Authority from student trust funds, according to John L. DeNyse, vice chancellor for administration and finance.

Edward Ryan, the Physical Plant's construction director, said the thrust of the renovations is to enlarge the athletic facility.

"There will be no major struetural changes made," Ryan said.

An additional 4,000 spectators will be seated in new retractable bleachers, that will roll back and create even more room.

The cage's dirt floor will be replaced with a concrete one, Ryan said. Also, a synthetic surface surface which can be used for track, lacrosse, softball and baseball will be installed.

A portable wooden floor will be constructed for basketball. A 9,000-square-foot addition to the south end of the building, facing the Munson Hall Annex, will take up half the existing parking lot, and will provide more locker rooms for home and visiting teams. There will also be officials' rooms, medical rooms, and more storage space for equipment. An aluminum cased skylight to let in natural light will be built into the roof of the addition.

A ticket office accesible from inside and outside the Cage will be constructed within the addition.

Although the roof of the building will not be changed, it will be insulated to conserve energy and improve acoustics.

"There will also be an officials' room, medical rooms and more storage space for equipment."
— Edward Ryan Physical Plant

The inside walls will be painted with longer lasting paint, and the grounds on the west and south sides will be landscaped.

Construction began four weeks ago with the installation of a fence around the site. During construction the men's and women's basketball games will be played at the Springfield Civic Center.

David Booth, a member of the Campus Physical Planning Committee, said the committee had reviewed the renovation plans in April and made recommendations concerning lighting, accesibility for the handicapped, and parking around the area. Booth said the committee's concern "was to make sure student's needs are met."

Collegian photo by Paul Desmarais

Varsity sports and UMass students may utilize the "new" cage Physical Plant workers are busily working on to complete. University officials expect renovations to be completed by the next basketball season.

Students 'shortchanged' in humanities studies

WASHINGTON — Many American college graduates lack "even the most rudimentary knowledge" of history, literature, art and philosophy, and the blame rests with faculty and administrators who have lost faith in the humanities, a Reagan administration official charged yesterday.

William J. Bennett, chairman of the National Endowment for the Humanities, in a report crafted with the advice of prominent scholars and college leaders, called upon the academic community to place "study of the humanities and Western civilization...at the heart of the college curriculum."

"Most of our college graduates remain shortchanged in the humanities," Bennett wrote. "The fault lies principally with those of us whose business it is to educate those students."

By their "indifference and...intellectual diffidence," too many educators have abdicated "the great task of transmitting a culture to its rightful heirs," Bennett said.

He cited these statistics:

• The number of majors in English has dropped by 57 percent since 1970; in philosophy by 41 percent; in history by 62 percent; and in modern languages by 50 percent.

• A third of all colleges required some foreign language study for admission in 1966, but only 14 percent in 1983. And less than half now require foreign language study during college, down from nearly 90 percent in 1966.

• Students can graduate from 75 percent of U.S. colleges and universities without studying European history; from 72 percent without studying American literature or history; and from 86 percent without studying ancient Greek or Roman civilization.

Bennett, a former philosophy professor, is considered a leading candidate to succeed T.H. Bell as secretary of education.

"Too many students are graduating from American colleges and universities lacking even the most rudimentary knowledge about the history, literature, art and philosophical foundations of their nation and their civilization," Bennett said in his 42-page paper.

"The decline in learning in the humanities was caused in part by a failure of nerve and faith on the part of many college faculties and administrators," it said.

Hijackers 'outraged' by refusal of demands

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia — Somalia rejected hijackers' demands for the release of political prisoners yesterday and said it holds Ethiopia responsible for the safety of more than 100 hostages aboard a Somali jetliner here.

The armed hijackers holding the Somali Airlines Boeing 707 at Addis Ababa's main airport told Ethiopian negotiatiors they were "extremely outraged" by Somalia's refusal to meet their demands. But they again extended by 12 hours their deadline for blowing up the plane with everyone aboard.

The Ethiopian Foreign Ministry said in a statement that the new deadline — the fourth set by the sky pirates since they commandeered the jetliner Saturday — is noon today, 4 a.m. EST.

It said apparently five people were holding the plane — the three hijackers who seized control of the craft plus two passengers who subsequently joined them.

The hijackers freed 19 passengers and three crew members Saturday. Officials said there are still 103 passengers and crew aboard the craft along with the three hijackers and their two accomplices.

"The Ethiopian government, out of concern for human life, has appealed to the hijackers...not to make this unfortunate incident become a hostage to a time factor," said the Ethiopian statement, read to reporters over the telephone by Foreign Ministry spokesman Tefera Gizaw.

Professional car thieves create little chance for owner recovery

WASHINGTON — So many professional criminals have taken up auto theft that the chance of recovering a stolen vehicle has declined to little better than 50-50, and locking your car door provides less protection than ever, a federal study said yesterday.

"Vehicle theft is no longer a matter of juvenile joyriding," says a report prepared by Abt Associated Inc. for the Justice Department's National Institute of Justice.

People under age 18 accounted for 56 percent of the vehicle thieves arrested in 1970, but only 40 percent by 1981, it said.

"This is increasingly becoming an adult crime involving gangs making enormous profits," said James K. Stewart, director of the institute. "About 1 million motor vehicles are stolen in this country every year, costing us an estimated $3.5 billion."

In 1970, passenger cars comprised 91 percent of stolen vehicles; trucks, 2 percent, and motorcycles and other vehicles, 7 percent. But by 1981, autos accounted for only 75 percent; trucks and buses accounted for 14 percent, and motorcycles and other vehicles for 11 percent.

At the same time, the recovery rate dropped from 84 percent to 55 percent, and the value of unrecovered vehicles increased tenfold in 1980.

UMass graduate discusses Nicaraguan struggle

By REBECCA THATCHER
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts graduate travelled to Nicaragua this fall afraid there would be a U.S. invasion but upon arrival she found a full scale, ongoing and bloody war.

Angela J. Keefe, 21, a 1984 graduate in political science, spent five weeks in a language and cultural program in the city of Esteli, and three weeks travelling and working on agricultural cooperatives throughout northern Nicaragua.

"It's a real war, not a border skirmish. At least two bodies were brought back to Esteli per week," Keefe said, refering to the attacks made by contras, who are supported by the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency.

Keefe said the willingness of the Nicaraguan people to defend their country had amazed her. "My sense is that the people want peace, but they are ready to fight. Fifty thousand have died already--they will continue to fight for what those people died for," she said.

Keefe said the contras, or counter revolutionaries, "are not fighting a traditional war."

"The contras never attack military installations or batallions, they attack schools and cooperatives (farms) and burn tabacco barns," she said.

Keefe described the November elections in Nicaragua, the first since the 1979 Sandinista revolution as "incredibly clean."

She said the Sandinistas won the election because they have been working with the people since they formed 23 years ago and are a "mass based" party.

The president-elect, Daniel Ortega, is known by the people as brilliant and dedicated Keefe said.

"He has been working for social change in Nicaragua since he was 14, he is a truly organic leader - a leader who comes from the people," she said.

People have access to the government through various mass organizations, she said, such as women's organizations, labor unions, and the Sandinista Youth.

Keefe said women in Nicaragua have the backing of the government in their fight against discrimination, but as feminists, their agenda is different from North American feminists.

"Their primary role is to do everything they can for the war effort, she said.

Keefe said she was deeply moved when observing a meeting of a 40-member agricultural cooperative when they were discussing whether or not to admit women as full-fledged members.

"The eight women at the meeting insisted that they needed to know how to use guns, so right then in the middle of the meeting they were shown how to load and fire a gun," Keefe said.

Women in Nicaragua have trouble understanding the non-violence associated with North American feminism because for them, "non-violence means death," she said.

Keefe described her Spanish teacher in the language program as "the embodiment of a liberated women in Nicaragua."

Her teacher Estela Rocha was a combatant in the mountains from 1977 to 1979 who recently decided not to go back into combat.

"She wanted to defend the revolution for her children," Keefe said.

Oxfam fast yields $4,307

More students donate most money in five years

By LORI KIRKLAND
Special to the Collegian

University of Massachusetts students donated more money in the Nov. 15 Oxfam America fast than in any during the past five years, UMass Hunger Task Force treasurer said.

According to John Horsler, 2,312 students fasted this year to raise money to help the world's hungry as compared to about 1,700 last fall.

He said last year's donations amounted to $2,560 in comparison to this year's figure that exceed $4,307 and attributed most of the programs success to recent publicity about world hunger.

"The community recognizes the situation in Ethiopia and the urgency that something be done," he said, referring to the famine in Africa.

"Though the fast was a great success, it just is not enough" he said.

The money collected from the fast goes to Oxfam America which sets up small projects in famine stricken areas. "Though Oxfam has a famine relief agency for emergencies, the organization works to help people help themselves," Dan Stackford task force president said. This means the benefits are not just temporary, he said.

The task force will continue its work even though the annual fast is over by accepting donations from anyone which can be made in room 428 of the Student Union Building.

The task force will schedule a Hunger Awareness week for February, Horsler said. The Hunger Awareness committee in collaboration with Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey will help the task force organize the program, he said.

"The fast can be called a big success locally," Horsler said. "But internationally it is very small. Thirty-five million people are starving to death; it takes $48 a year to keep each one alive...that's a lot of money."

WOMEN'S FORUM

Women's Forum is a weekly listing of events relating to women's issues. Notices should be sent to the Women's News Editor, care of the Collegian, Friday before the event.

MONDAY — The Committee for Equal Rights and Reproductive Freedom will meet from 5 to 7 p.m. in the Campus Center; check schedule for room number.

TUESDAY — A planning meeting for a spring "Take Back the Night" march will be held from 7 to 9 p.m. in Room 902 Campus Center.

WEDNESDAY — The Women's Issues Team of the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) will meet at 4 p.m. in Campus Center Room 804. Many activities are planned and new members are encouraged to attend.

The Everywoman's Center is sponsoring a support group for gay women who are concerned about their drinking and drug use at 6:30 to 8 p.m. The group will meet eight times (no meetings held during intersession). It will discuss how alcohol and/or drugs affect members' lives and explore alternative ways of dealing with problems.

THURSDAY — The Third World Women's Program invites all to an open house from 6:30 to 8:30 p.m. at Yvonne's Restaurant in New Africa House. Women are encouraged to come and share ideas with the program which provides programming to promote a better understanding of issues confronting women of color.

The rape hotline is 545-0800.

Rape task force holds training workshop today

The rape task force awareness training workshop will be held today at the Dukes room in the Student Union Building.

The workshop will help educate the community about issues concerning rape, said Mary Dumas, an administrator in the sensitive crimes unit of the University of Massachusetts police.

Dumas said the workshop is held cooperatively through the Department of Public Safety, the University Health Service, and the Everywoman's Center and is available to University groups that are interested in awareness training.

The aim of the awareness training is: to inform the community of services available, to educate people on how to respond to rape victims, to educate about certain attitudes and behavior in our society that perpetuate rape, to increase effective programs for the community concerning rape and to educate people about certain precautionary measures to prevent rape, Dumas said.

WMUA offers airtime slots for women

By ELLEN REYNOLDS
Collegian Correspondent

Providing air time for women musicians and experience for women broadcasters is the goal of the Women's Media Project, a WMUA program which has changed in content and format this year.

"Our primary objective is to provide the audience with a program that promotes a positive image of women, but it's also important that everybody listen to the show, including men," siad Maureen Peters, Women's Affairs director and coordinator of the project.

The Women's Media Project originated in 1977 through the efforts of the Women's Media Network, a multi-media organization for women interested in developing skills in video, broadcasting, graphics and journalism. After the Women's Media Network dissolved several years ago, WMUA took responsibility for the content and format of the program.

This year's additions to the Women's Media Project include women's news, sports, and comedy hour. There will also be interviews with women from various campus and feminist groups. In keeping with last year's policy, all music is performed by women.

"We air new releases by female artists so they can get the kind of exposure unavailable to them on other stations," Peters said. "Of course we still play feminist music. We're just incorporating it with other progressive sounds."

Alison Maloon, a program staff member, chose to join the Women's Media Project after promotional and broadcasting work in other areas of the radio station.

"The Women's Media Project offered a real switch from the other programming I'd worked on," Maloon said. "Personally, I try to play all different kinds of music, especially women's reggae, which generally doesn't get much air play."

As coordinator of the Women's Media Project, Peters encourages women interested in broadcasting to become involved in the program.

The Women's Media Project is scheduled on Sundays, 7-10 p.m., on WMUA, 91.1 FM.

Hand gun control: A costly mistake

Curtis Hunting

Wednesday morning was cold, with a strong wind coming from the north. It sent a painful chill through the two men standing on the edge of the vast target area, now deserted for two years. Some tumbleweeds are rolling past the men as they start to talk and reminisce about how popular and prosperous the establishment was before the Federal Government passed its law banning the ownership of pistols by private citizens.

This, we know, has not taken place "as of yet," but with the way the government and its members are leaning, it could happen very soon. I, for one, won't stand by and let it happen without a fight. By fight I mean through the due process of law, through legislation, through my vote, and other ways.

There are those who feel the laws would be a blessing. I say "No." They say it would lower violent crimes such as murder, armed robbery and aggravated assault. This is true, but to a lesser degree than they think.

In 1983, 18,673 violent crimes occured. Of those, 58.34 percent were with firearms. Of the 58.34 percent, 75.1 percent were with handguns, 7.6 percent were with rifles, 11.4 percent were with shotguns, and .17 percent others. The remaining 41.66 percent were 21.8 percent stabbing, 5.7 percent blunt instrument, 6.8 percent were personal weapons, and 4.9 percent others (strangling, poison).

In the case of armed robbery, the percentage of weapons used were 36.7 percent firearms. Of that, 18.7 percent were handguns. The remaining categories were: 13.6 percent stabbing, 9.5 percent blunt instruments, and 40.3 percent were strong armed. The point is, if you add up all the facts, you'll find that overall, more crimes are committed without handguns than with handguns.

Another argument is that there will be less complex laws on transporting firearms across state lines. What about the new laws they will have to come up with to cover those who just happen to still have a handgun or two in the closet.

It would be an impossible, no improbable, feat to ban handguns in this country. Just the cost of this absurd law to the sportsman and to the government would be phenominal.

The sportsman has a large amount of money invested in his handguns. Who is going to decide how much the person is get for each particular gun? Some are old and worth a large sum of money as antiques; others are very valuable for their precision. Some are worth even more money for being collectors' editions. Who would make these decisions? Or does the government think they could just collect the guns without compensating the owner.

Who is going to pay for all the labor involved in getting the guns collected and disposed of. Will it be the State or Federal authorities?

In the United States today there is total of 449,370 full time law enforcement officers on duty. That is about 2.2 officers per 1,000 inhabitants. These are poor odds, and they would need to hire a lot more. Either way, it comes back to us, the taxpayers.

There are clubs for pistol target shooting, that have millions of dollars invested in their facilities for the firing of these handguns. What does the government expect to say to them? "Sorry gentlemen, but you will just have to take it on the chin this time." Does this sound fair? No.

No matter how much money the government spends, they will never collect all the handguns in this country. This is because there are handguns bought through private sale, and the new owner never registers the weapon. Then there are those handguns that have been stolen and then sold, and there is no way to track these guns down. There will always be that fraction of handguns out there available to the criminal element that is always present in our society today.

If they ban handguns, what will be next? Guns in general, then no police, just the Army National Guard doing the police's job, and we know who their bosses are. That is just a hypothetical situation, but the general idea should be clear.

Now then, the two men standing in the cold wind, with the tumbleweeds blowing past in the target area of the Sportsmen Club suddenly disappear. It's all been a bad dream by the President of the local chapter of the NRA (National Riflemen's Association.)

Curtis Hunting is a UMass student.

Gotta love those 'radicals'

Just what the hell will it take to make people see? Do I really have to slap the entire population a few hard times in the face before they wake up? Because if I have to I will.

I don't know what is worse: misdirected zeal or plain apathy. There are the "true-American" conservatives who are rallying 'round Ronnie like heroine junkies who need a fix of political bullshit to keep them going. What will it take to demystify these myopic, political moonies?

Then there are the religious apatheties who faithfully worship every Friday and Saturday night at the local bar. Their prayers include "Two For One," "Happy Hour," and "Wet T-Shirt Hymn." They can be heard reciting these all the time and everywhere with fervent devotion. What will it take for them to see?

And as well there are the "progressive" few who, (ignorant of the fact that political ideology isn't measured on a linear spectrum), defeat themselves and the whole "Save the Humans" movement by spewing out such garbage as "Oh screw them, they're just stinking jocks." What will it take for them to see?

Face it people, we are still living in the ME generation, a continuum of the 70s, a product of aggressive, profit-seeking capitalism's invasion of every aspect of our lives, public and private. When will we ever get out?!

We are not being true human beings if our desire to be "true Americans" results in narcotic, (and oppresive) self-worship. Does anyone actually need culture?--Ya, like a baby needs a pacifier; as a blanket for security. Can't we all stand up alone and take off all our clothes? They have only become a dehumanizing, segregating status symbol, a uniform of our degressive culture.

Be real, people! Get off your asses. After all, if it wasn't for "radicals" we'd still be in the caveman era.

Mark A. Caldeira is a UMass student.

Letters to the Editor

More information is needed

After reading the article, "Study Aids Waste Plan" in the Collegian Nov. 15, which was predominantly about how most people (households) do not know how to properly dispose of toxic wastes generated in the home (i.e. pesticides, antifreeze, paint thinners), I have a question.

Now that we are aware of this problem, my question is simply, how should these toxic chemicals be disposed of properly? There was mention in the article that a toxic chemical collection project is needed or might be started by more towns.

Are there any towns nearby that offer the service of collecting toxic wastes generated by households? And are there any alternatives in the absence of a town collection project, other than dumping the chemicals in the ground or down the drain?

I, and I think others, would appreciate an informative response.

George Lane, Amherst

The vindication of supply side

I remember my macroeconomics TA laughing at the Laffer Curve, and my Sociology professor trying to persuade the class that supply side economics would never work. Indeed, for too long now, supply-siders have been picked apart and verbally attacked at every turn; it's about time for a response.

Supply side economics stresses the supply side effects of taxation in macro economic policy; supply siders advocate economic growth through the alteration of incentives to save, produce, and consume. Meanwhile, Keynesians look mainly at changes in aggregate demand to formulate their fiscal policy.

In the past year and a half, the Keynesians and Walter Mondale have blamed supply side economics and Ronald Reagan for anything negative that has happened in the economy, and have taken credit for anything positive. According to Walter Mondale, Reagan's tax cuts have caused the recession and the huge budget deficit, while the latest economic recovery resulted from the increases in federal spending (the belief that deficit spending fosters economic growth is a cornerstone of Keynesian theory).

These arguments remain plausible only as long as you ignore the facts. In the first place, it is difficult and indeed ridiculous to blame a recession that began in July 1981 on President Reagan's tax cuts, which didn't take effect until October 1981. Since Reagan's compromised tax program called for a 25 percent federal income tax reduction to be phased in over a three year period, his first tax cut (1981-1982) amounted to only 5 percent. This tax cut was overshadowed by other tax increases from bracket creep, Social Seeurity payroll taxes, and consumption taxes; thus the net tax burden increased in 1981, a total of $15 billion.

Supply siders wanted an immediate 25 percent tax reduction in 1981, not a phased in program. The incentive approach embraced by supply siders enabled us to see that the mediocre 1981 tax cut might cause producers to delay their expansion. Not only did the "phased-in" approach delay the positive effects of tax cuts, but, as Arthur Laffer said in 1982, producers were forced to "put off investments and income-producing work to wait for a more favorable situation."

Peter Dow

That "more favorable situation" came officially on July 1, 1983, when the first net tax reduction took effect; it was worth $15 billion. Then, true to the supply siders beliefs, as incentives for investment in production replaced investment in tax shelters, the economic recovery began; and the economy continues on its path of steady economic growth with low inflation rates. Keynesians should be dumbfounded by this phenomenon, since they do not believe that incentives have any effect on the economy and do not exist; they only concentrate on the demand side of fiscal policy, not the supply side.

Another point for argument involves the existence of the Laffer Curve, which basically states that by decreasing tax rates we can increase tax revenues by broadening the tax base. This bulwark of supply side theory is hogwash according (but not limited) to the UMass Economics Department, whose opinions on the subject I'm sure we can attest to from personal experience. But the existence of the Laffer Curve is justified by looking at some facts which reveal a few interesting trends. In 1981, the personal tax rate for the top marginal rates (net incomes over $50,000) were cut from 70 percent to 50 percent; and, just as supply siders had predicted, the tax base was broadened and tax revenues increased. Following that tax reduction, the percentage of income tax collected from that group (above $50,000) rose from 32.9 percent to 35.4 percent. At the same time, the share paid by those making $20,000 or less fell from 17.1 percent to 15.5 percent (figures from U.S. Treasury Department). Thus the percentage of taxes paid by the rich is on the increase, despite the Keynesians' beliefs that tax incentives do not effect the economy.

In short, what Reagan needs to do now is to rid himself of the Stockmans and Feldsteins within his Cabinet, and replace them with staunch supply siders who have a clear fiscal policy.

The Mongrel Puppies cook

By HON STRYMISH and PETER WISSOKER
Collegian Staff

In case you haven't noticed there is a sixties revival going on, and there could be no such revival without psychedelia. And now the psychedelic band of 1984, local faves the Mongrel Puppies, have finally released their first album, Let's Barbeque.

When psychedelia first came out it was new and exciting music. Now, with fewer people dropping acid, it has taken on a new dimension as the logical synthesis of hardcore and new wave. It is this duality that makes The Mongrel Puppies.

The Mongrel Puppies bring to mind San Francisco and Los Angeles circa 1967 and such long forgotten bands as the Chocalate Watchband and The Thirteenth Floor Elevators.

Of the hundreds of roots bands of the sixties only a few went on to fulfill any kind of creative potential. The few who have done this (The Rolling Stones, The Kinks) have managed because they have developed their own styles and personalities. The Mongrel Puppies have had some success establishing their own sound but "Transonic Dream", for example, is too close to the sound of any number of Cream songs with a twist of the Dead Kennedys thrown in.

Yet the significance of such overt influences is somewhat diminished because the straight psychedelia of the Mongrel Puppies comes off much better than that of many bands which try to make pseudo psychedelia, or psychedelia with an intellectual twist which works in theory but not in practice.

The Mongrel Puppies do work in practice. Don Patuno's lead guitar on "Martin's Theme" and "What's on Your Mind" shows beautifully understated development in the Hendrix style. Stansell and Passa's lyrics on "What's on Your Mind" express sentiments straight from the sixties updated for the '80's. These lyrics are built to move. The Mongrel Puppies with Let's Barbeque become the here and now action band.

A daring solo album

SMALL TOWN ROMANCE
Richard Thompson
Hannibal Records
by PETER WISSOKER
Collegian Staff

Another electric guitarist has decided to perform solo on an acoustic guitar. But unlike Pete Townsend or Sting or even Jerry Garcia (who needs a bass player), Richard Thompson dares to play sets consisting of mostly new material rather than depending upon his past fame.

Thompson started out as lead guitarist for Fairport Convention, a late 1960's folk rock band which produced the landmark Liege and Lief album. It was the prototype, much imitated but never equaled by groups like Steelye Span and Pentangle.

After Thompson left Fairport Convention he recorded numerous albums by himself and with his wife Linda. In 1982 Richard and Linda split up despite increasing popular success. Last year Thompson's solo album, Hand of Kindness, was really great. The tour that followed included an eight-piece big band complete with horns.

Small Town Romance is taken from a series of acoustic shows that Thompson did in New York. Much of the material is new. The songs are mostly about love. Thompson's Scottish accent makes the sad songs sound even sadder and makes "Honky-Tonk Blues" all the more entertaining. Small Town Romance is a compilation of folk songs and stands as that, without needing to be validated by his previous laurels. But the old songs like "I Want to See the Bright Lights", the title song from a 1974 album, still sound good despite Linda's absence.

This album is recommended. Thompson's guitar playing is always interesting and his songwriting stands up to a straight listening of the whole album, something I can't say about many folk albums.

Richard Thompson will be playing at the Iron Horse on Wednesday night.

Testament probes the fear

Testament
Monday, November 26
On Channel 57 at 9:00 p.m.
By CHARLES FRANCIS CARROLL
Collegian Staff

The much acclaimed but little known film Testament will be shown on T.V. tonight at 9:00 p.m. on Channel 57. Panned by moviehouse audiences, who perhaps found the film too depressing when it was first released, Testament hasn't received the attention that it deserves. I was fortunate to see it earlier this semester on campus. It was one of the most moving films I have ever seen.

Jane Alexander plays the role of a housewife and mother who finds herself alone with her children after a nuclear bomb takes her husband's life in San Francisco. We follow this brave, deperate her family together while the community in a somewhat sheltered town in the Sierras begins to disintegrate into chaos.

In the difficult role of a mother watching her own children die one by one and burying them, Alexander more than succeeds in conveying a mother's grief for her children. But she also humanizes her role as a nuclear war victim. Far from being a bleak story, Testament is about the endearing and enduring relationships between victims thrust into a bleak setting.

Unlike The Day After (which was a chilling horror film), Testament is a dramatic tragedy that compares more to the Grapes of Wrath than with it's infamous predecesser. Like The Day After it may have its greatest moment on television. See it with a friend or a group of friends.

Wow, I wonder what's in the Collegian today?

UMass football: How hope became despair

Schedule and injuries plauged Minutemen

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

A lot was expected from the 1984 University of Massachusetts football team. A new coach, many people thought, would bring renewed success.

Rookie head coach Bob Stull came from Washington and changed the offense and UMass opening the season with an impressive upset of Division 1 Ball State, 26-10.

The remainder of the season, until the final game when UMass upset powerful New Hampshire 14-10, was one of disappointment for the Minutement. Even a 3-0 win over Northeastern wasn't played well.

The new offense sputtered, receivers dropped balls, junior quarterback Jim Simeone had trouble finding his secondary receivers and the running game was keyed on with some success by the opposition.

The defense, tough in the early going, was decimated by injuries to the line. The secondary allowed a lot of passing yards (230 a game) and opponents seemed to set a lot of offensive records against the Minutemen. Why?

The schedule for one. The Minutemen faced no less than six nationally-ranked Division 1-AA teams and lost to five of them.

A 3-8 record, although not acceptable, is easily understandable.

"We we're in every game, from the point of being competitive up until the Maine game, and I thought we played great teams like BU and URI very well," Stull said.

"It was a frustrating type of thing, we didn't pick up the system like I would've liked, the defense was hurt by a lot of injuries, we didn't get any breaks," the coach said.

For the first time in recent history, no UMass player made the first team Yankee Conference all-stars. The second team was peppered with UM players. Split end Bob Simeone, who set UMass receiving and yardage records, punter Jim Tandler, kicker George Papoutsidis, linebacker Dave Cavanaugh and offensive tackle Don Day all made the team.

Absent, but deserving, were linebacker Todd Comeau, linebacker Vito Perrone and running back George Barnwell (931 yds).

The quarterback job is up for grabs this spring. Simeone will compete with freshman Mike Trifari, red-shirted freshman Dave Palazzi and Alabama transfer Tim Hecht, a sophomore who was recruited by SMU, Oklahoma and the Crimson Tide out of high school. All four have great arms.

The receiving corps, without Simeone, is weak. Barnwell was the second leading receiver out of the backfield with senior tight end Paul Walsh next.

Flanker John Crowley had 19 receptions with no touchdowns and you have to go to running backs Frank Fay and Duckworth Grange to find a receiver with more than three catches.

UMass needs speedy wide outs next season if Stull wants to keep up the passing game he has instituted, and he does. The running backs seem set with Barnwell, Fay, Grange and Ted Barrett.

Good players are returning. Good players are also leaving. Spring drills will be an open affair with a lot of red-shirted younger players competing for spots. No starter is secure with the possible exceptions of linebacker Vito Perrone, tackle Bruce Strange, and Barnwell.

"It was a tough year to handle," Stull said. "And I don't want to repeat it again. With the season over, more work begins for the coaches. I'll promise you one thing, I'm not going to sit back. The adjustment period is over and we better start winning some games."

Minutemen open with Stonehill tonight

Green, Hempel and Cage are gone but UMass should be tough

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

The questions will begin to be answered tonight as the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team faces Stonehill College in the opening game of the 1984-85 season.

The game (7:30 p.m. at the Springfield Civic Center) will test the Minutemen's ability to play away from the Curry Hicks Cage (under renovation), without its leading scorer for the past two seasons (the transferred John Hempel) and a center with Edwin Green having graduated.

UMass will go with a three forward offense, co-captain Horace Neysmith at one spot, the bruising Bobby Braun,last season's sixth man, at another and either senior Ron Young or impressive freshman Wilbert Hicks at the other.

Co-captain Donald Russell and sophomore Carl Smith will start in the backcourt. Expect sophomore Darryl Carter, senior George Ramming and possibly junior Tom Emerson to see a lot of time in the early going.

"I don't know a lot about Stonehill other than that they play a 2-1-2 zone defense and are supposed to be pretty tough," UMass coach Ron Gerlufsen said.

The Chiefs, a member of the Northeast 8 conference, last played UMass in 1962 (UM won 47-42) and are best known for getting crushed by Boston College early in the season.

But the Chiefs went 17-13 last season and return ten lettermen including George Leonard, a 15.8 points-per-game scorer who also pulled down ten rebounds a game last season. Tony Fiore (14.7 ppg) and Peter Krause (12.2 and 4.5) are also back.

Stonehill athletic director Ray Pepin assumes the coaching reigns this season after Tom Folliard's resignation last year.

Neysmith will be looking to begin his final season at UMass with a big game. the 6-6 forward was snubbed for an Atlantic 10 all-conference team position despite a 13.2 scoring average and 7.6 rebounds a game. Russell (11.8 ppg) and Smith (7.2 ppg and a school and league record of 212 assists) both started last season.

The remaining two positions will have to do a lot of defensive work and rebounding according to Gerlufsen. Braun, at 6-6, 220, played well defensively off the bench last season. Hicks, a freshman from New Haven, CT, stands 6-7 and has a nice touch (23.2 ppg in high school), but lacks experience. Young, a senior, is a solid defensive player.

"Wilbert is a solid player, he's a good shooter, he can rebound and he has the physical tools, but like all freshmen he lacks experience and has to learn the system, but I like what I see," Gerlufsen said.

Young, 6-4, played in 20 games last year in the backcourt. He only averaged 1.3 ppg last year, but averaged six as a freshman and 5.5 as a sophomore.

"Ronnie has improved tremendously," Gerlufsen said. "It's up in the air right now who will start."

Carter, who will play both point guard and small forward, missed last season with academic troubles, but is ready to open his offensive show this season.

The other variable for today's game is how the "home" court advantage in Springfield will effect UMass.

The 4,200 who packed the confines of the Cage made opposing teams cringe, but those same 4,200 in the 8,000 seat Civic Center may look lost.

"We need our fans, no doubt about that," Gerlufsen said. "We will be a good team, an exciting one. We're worth coming out to see."

Ticket information

Game tickets: You can get game tickets either at the Civic Center before the game or at the Boyden Ticket Office (second floor) during the day. Bring an I.D.

Bus Tickets: May be obtained at the Boyden Ticket office during the day for $3. Buses will leave from Boyden starting at 6 p.m. and randomly as filled. After the game buses will leave immediately and then randomly as filled. The last bus leaves one hour before the game and the final bus leaves Springfield one hour after the game.

The Civic Center is in downtown Springfield. Park in either the Civic Center garage or in the Bay State West mall garage.

On Flutie, Thanksgiving and college basketball

First things first. Is Doug Flutie the best thing to come to this state since Steve's Ice Cream or what? There is nothing better than your friends, family, beer and football over Thanksgiving break and the Heisman winner-to-be's pass with no time left to beat Miami made my week. He's the type of player you'll tell your grandchildren you saw.

But who will the Eagles play in the Cotton Bowl? Texas, Houston or Southern Methodist? Can anyone from that run-oriented conference seriously pose a threat to the high-powered Eagles? BC may lack defense, but no Southwest Conference team can score like Flutie and the ten other guys on offense nobody seems to know.

And who will be number one in college football? I hope it's not Brigham Young. They will, in all probability, defeat Michigan (6-5) in the Holiday Bowl and win the title by default.

I don't begrudge the Cougars respect, they're good. But who have they played? The Western Athletic Conference is terrible and a mediocre Pitt was their only non-league opponent and they barely got by them.

Look at Oklahoma (a tie with Texas, victories over Nebraska and Oklahoma State and maybe over Washington in the Orange Bowl as a possible number one when the rankings come out.

On the local football scene, Boston University took a 35-33 loss to Richmond in the first round of the Division 1-AA playoffs on Saturday. Richmond plays Rhode Island next week. All three were UMass opponents with the Rams making the tourney thanks to UM's 20-14 victory over New Hampshire.

UMass, at 3-8, wasn't a good team, but they were an unlucky team. A tough schedule and injuries made the difference between respectability and the 3-8 mark. It's over used, but wait until next year. We even play Morgan (0 for New England teams) State for our opener. If you don't run it up on them (BU, UConn and Yale all did) you're in deep trouble.

COLLEGE BASKETBALL: Here's a mini-preview. My top 20 is Georgetown, DePaul, Illinois, Indiana, Duke, St. John's, Washington, N.C. State, Louisville and Memphis State in the top ten with Oklahoma, SMU, Syracuse, Arkansaw, Kansas, North Carolina, Georgia Tech, Virginia Tech, UNLV and Alabama-Birmingham in the bottom ten. The Final Four? Who can say? Georgetown, St. John's, Washington and Louisville maybe? It's impossible to predict.

The Abraham all-american team? That's easy. Georgetown's Pat Ewing-center, Oklahoma's Wayman Tisdale-forward, Illinois Efrem Winters-forward, Chris Mull of St. John's-guard and Duke's Johnny Dawkins-guard. With 134 games on ESPN I'll watch 'em all at least once and probably twice.

Who's better, the Big East or the ACC? Tradition and depth is on the side of the ACC but talent and coaching lives in the Big East. Tough to pick, but the league with Georgetown, Syracuse, St. John's and Villanova (all possible Top 20) is my choice. Players like Mulling, Ewing, the Pearl, Ed Piekney and Michael Adams are tough to beat for pure court entertainment. DePaul was a narrow 59-58 winner over Northern Illinois and Illinois already was beaten, so anything can happen and will this season.

PRO BASKETBALL: Celtics, Celtics, Celtics! The green is back with a mission, snap the Russell curse. They've lost one game and haven't come close in any others. Bird has been, well Larry Bird. DJ is the best guard in the NBA and Parrish and McHale have been playing very well. Who's to stop K.C. and the Sunshine Band? Not the 76ers (when Sam Williams starts, you're in trouble), the Knicks, ha and the Lakers haven't got the competition or the horses to compete come playoff time.

RAMBLINGS: My dive in the Collegian's NFL picks rivals anything Greg Louganis has ever done. It's pretty terrible going 4-11 two weeks straight. When's the hockey season over? What record has Gretzky set? Who really cares? Are the Houston Rockets for real? Do you, like me, watch the 11 p.m. news just to see what Air Jordan has done that night? I was glad to see Dick Vitale on ESPN last Monday with college hoop preview. Anybody who wants to talk wrestling should see Tony "Sports Talk" Betros or myself. The newsroom crew in the Collegian kind of wonders about us.

UMASS NEWS: Soccer coach Jeff Gettler was named Division 1 New England coach of the year by the coaches association. He took the Minutemen from 3-12-4 to 9-8-3 and a one week stay in the Top 20. Freshman forward Kurt Manal, the team's leading scorer, was named to the all-N.E. team as well.

Women's soccer players Lori Stukes and Chris Taggart were also names to the NE team, but couldn't play in the all-star team due to a prior engagement, the national championships in North Carolina.

UMass faces Stonehill in the opening hoop game of the season tonight in Springfield. I know it's a project to get to Springfield and it's three bucks, but do it.

UMass Schedule:

Men's Basketball: Stonehill (at the Springfield Civic Center), 7:30 p.m. Opening game of season.

Director of admissions will depart

By IAN POLUMBAUM
Collegian Staff

The director of freshman admissions at the University of Massachusetts will leave his job in January to become deam of admissions and financial aid at the University of Rhode Island.

David G. Taggart has worked in admissions at UMass since 1972. He was named director of admissions for first-year students in 1980, and was responsible for recruiting students to the University's seven colleges and the Stockbridge School of Agriculture.

"It's a very attractive promotion," Taggart said of the URI position, at which he will start Jan. 7.

Larry G. Benedict, dean of academic support services, said, "I am excited for him, but he certainly will be missed. He's done so much good work here through the last twelve years."

Taggart said the admissions office's greatest accomplishment during his tenure was changing from "a rather reactive, in-house operation that sat back waiting for students to knock on the door, to a very aggressive and progressive one."

In response to the steadily declining number of students graduating from high school, the admissions office successfully "went into aggressive marketing-projecting the positive aspects of the University," he said.

He said 17,144 people applied for 4,000 places to enter UMass this year, a 24 percent increase over fall 1982. But he said the highest number of applications he has seen was 21,000 in 1972, when college students were exempt from fighting in the Vietnam war.

Taggart, 45, received a B.S. in education from Lowell State College in 1963 and a master of education degree from Springfield College in 1969.

Campus Center switch needs fix

Maintenance workers from Westinghouse must replace a main circuit breaker in the Campus Center, after they shut down the building last Wednesday evening but were unable to replace a broken switch, according to a Physical Plant engineer.

The circuit breaker has been broken for six months, according to Dudley Bridges, manager of building operations. The problem was discovered last summer during a major overhaul of the electrical system.

The breaker is a central switchboard which controls the flow of electricity in the Campus Center. The switches to release electricity are automated, and one of them is malfunctioning, Bridges said the delay in getting a replacement was caused by a strike at the company that makes the parts.

Bridges said the repairs come under the original contract with Westinghouse and cost the University nothing.

During the shutdown Wednesday the heat and electricity were turned off and fire alarms were put on batteries, Bridges said. The heat and electricity still work, but when the circuit breaker trips - shutting off current in the event of an overload - the switch must be flipped back on by hand.

Fake ID's will draw $200 fine

By JOEL P. COFFIDIS
Collegian Staff

Students who falsify or alter their identification cards now face a $200 fine in the Hampshire County District Court.

Albertus Morse, the chief justice of the Northampton courthouse, will double his normal penalty of $100 because of "concern with the number of cases coming in front of him," University of Massachusetts Police Chief Robert Joyce said.

Joyce said Morse is trying to send a warning to underage drinkers who alter their IDs to say they are older, or use someone else's card.

He added, "A felony conviction stays with you after the fine.

Altering identification also carries a felony charge.

"Since it is a felony conviction, it can have a direct effect on someone who is thinking of joining the military or other profession where a felony looks particularly bad," Joyce said.

Joyce said a judge's decision in a license alteration case could be more severe than the $200 fine that has been implemented by Morse.

"A judgement could go as high as 5 years in state prison and a $500 fine or a two-year sentence in a house of correction with a $500 fine," Joyce said. He added,"Again, the felony will stay with you after the fine is paid and/or the sentence is served."

Joyce explained that when someone is arrested for possession of an altered license it is usually a costly experience, especially for the college student.

"Once arrested, there's a possibility of spending a day or at least a period of time in jail," Joyce said. "Then the individual has to miss a day of classes for going to court and miss another day to attend the pre-trial conference, where you usually hire a lawyer since it's a felony," Joyce said.

Joyce said that in false representation cases where someone lends their license for someone else's use, "the registry of motor vehicles can deal with the case themselves, along with the police.

"This could result in suspension of license for up to one year for the license owner," Joyce said. He added, "if you can't drive in this state, you won't be able to drive in any other state."

Women are a fighting presence in ROTC

By CAROLYN ROSENBAUM
Collegian Correspondent

Ten years ago the Reserve Officer's Training Corps (ROTC) began accepting female cadets and today more than twenty percent of the recruits at the University of Massachusetts are women, according to Major Jay Bullington, a recruiting officer for UMass Air Force ROTC.

Equal opportunity is stressed in ROTC, he said, because "the military cannot and does not discriminate against women."

Major James Mahoney, enrollment officer for UMass Army ROTC, said women realizing that the combination of physical training, scholarships and management experience offered by ROTC is "a good deal."

"A woman with ROTC in her background will jump ten steps ahead in the considerations of the personnel office of any company she applies to if she decides to pursue a civilian career," he said.

"Right now we're involved in a large recruiting mission for nurses and Hispanic women. Army nurses have to go through the (ROTC) program and Hispanic women have been under-represented for many years," Mahoney said.

Mechanical heart recipient's status improves after surgery

LOUISVILLE, Ky. (AP) — William J. Schroeder's bleeding was stopped and his circulation was "excellent" on his second day living with the soft clicking of a mechanical heart inside his chest, doctors said.

"He is not bleeding...There appear to be no major complications," said Dr. Allan M. Lansing, chairman of Humana Heart Institute International in Louisville and assistant to Dr. William C. DeVries, who implanted the artificial heart.

"He is warm, pink and dry, indicating excellent circulation," Lansing said at a press briefing.

Schroeder underwent emergency surgery to stop excessive bleeding Sunday night, less than six hours after he became the second person in history to receive a permanent artificial heart.

The excessive bleeding was stopped, but not before Schroeder had lost half of his blood through a hole where the artificial heart was stitched to his aorta, the artery that carries blood to the rest of the body.

Schroeder lost less than two pints of blood overnight, which Lansing said was normal for a patient recovering from open heart surgery.

Schroeder, a 52-year-old quality assurance specialist from Jasper, Ind., who was forced to retire because of ill health, was under sedation and breathing with the help of a respirator, Lansing said.

Schroeder remained in a specially prepared room in the coronary intensive care unit, tethered to the $40,000 Utah-drive system, one of two external power systems that he will be tied to for the rest of his life.

His wife of 32 years, Margaret, visited him there Monday morning and held his hand. Doctors said Schroeder "seemed to recognize her." Mrs. Schroeder was described by hospital officials as "very happy to see her husband."

Guinness assesses run across U.S.

HYANNIS, Mass. (AP) — Sandy Goldstein, who says she ran 3,328 miles from California to Cape Cod alone in 130 days, is going to get a niche in the Guinness Sports Record Book for a trans-America trip, say an editor.

But because she didn't have anyone along to verify her steps, getting into the Guinness World Record Book is still a question mark.

"We are putting her and some other women in the sports record book which comes out next spring," said American editor David Boehm in a telphone interview from his New York office. "We're going to put in the three claimants. Maybe by the time it comes out, we will have more information."

"She has no witnesses," said Boehm of Ms. Goldstein, 38. "I think she is honest; I think she did it. We can't tell if she picked up a ride here and there, but that's true of all of them...

From SGA speaker to Alumni Relations director

By LARRY BOUCHIE
Collegian Staff

As an ex-speaker and co-president of the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association and a '78 graduate, director of alumni relations Jonathon Hite now serves the University as an administrator.

Hired as director in Dec. 1981, Hite said that the transition from student activist to campus administrator was facilitated by his SGA experience and relationships.

"There's a misconception about the way that the SGA and the administration relate to each other," Hite said, explaining that one reason for this is past SGA leaders who saw themselves as adversaries of administrators.

"I think you'll find that if you look back over the last (several) years, that the presidents of student government who've done that have failed miserably," Hite said, "I tried...to know people as people, not just as the (person) behind the desk."

"If you can develop a sense of mutual respect with the administrators, or with the faculty, or with anybody...it's much easier to deal with them and get what you want," he said.

It is this same method of cultivating relationships that Hite employs when working with University alumni. With almost 100,000 alumni, the University is actively engaged in soliciting their financial and intellectual aid, Hite said.

Although a UMass alumni, David Beaubien, is chair of the Massachusetts Board of Regents for Higher Education and alumni James Collins, D-Mass., is a representative in the state legislature, Hite said that the University still requires alumni support for budget requests, campus planning, and financial contributions.

Hite said he believes alumni feel positive about the University because "they were able to master their experience here (and) the University provided them with the opportunity to advance."

Because of this, Hite said, many alumni now want to help the University, and his job is to maintain working relationships with them, organize alumni events, and solicit their support.

Dallas Darland, Hite's supervisor and director of development and alumni affairs, said, "A very substantial part of Jon's work is constituency relations" involving personal contact with alumni seeking information, assistance, and advice.

Darland said that Hite also serves as the liason between the University and the Alumni Association Board, oversees alumni group insurance and travel packages, initiates market studies on alumni interests and capabilities, involves students with alumni events, and has been planning future alumni programs.

Hite said he is also trying to place more development officers off campus, to get more concise information on alumni and corporations they are involved with, and to increase student awareness of alumni programs while they are students.

Hite said students should realize UMass is excellent preparation for real life.

"The University is the epitome of the real world," Hite said, explaining that the requirements are similar, the bureaucracy is similar, and "the secret to this University is being tenacious."

He said that the University gained a "ZooMass" reputation because of its rural location.

"If someone gets stabbed here, it's the biggest news that the police will have," Hite said. "If it were at happen at Boston University, it would blend right in."

★ ROTC

Major Frances Dennis said female presence in ROTC has changed the role of women in the Army. She said before women were allowed in ROTC, the Women's Army Corps (W.A.C.) only trained them for administrative positions.

"The W.A.C.'s didn't fire weapons," she said.

Army ROTC cadets Karen Crowley, a senior management major, and Angela Atchison, a senior psychology major, are considering military careers.

"In the military there are standards for periodic promotion which are equal for men and women," Crowley, a Cadet Training Officer, said.

"In a civilian career I could spend four years in an entry-level position," she said.

Cadets Crowley and Atchison agree that the weapons and survival training has given them self confidence.

"In one exercise we had to crawl out on a rope over the water, hang on and then drop. After that I felt I could do anything," Atchison said.

"We get a lot of support from the guys," Crowley said.

ROTC classes compliment the cadets' other classes, they said.

"A lot of my psychology classes overlap with the material from military science," Atchison said.

Cadets Jayme Casgrain-Guido and her husband David Guido met in the Army and are completing bachelors degrees at UMass while taking part in ROTC. Casgrain-Guido plans to pursue a career in broadcast journalism.

"I'd like to try being a war correspondent. I've learned a lot about management though, so maybe I'll end up as the president of NBC," she said.

Student resumes bolstered by the 'second curriculum'

By YADIRA A. BETANCES
Collegian Staff

A "second curriculum has been implemented at the University of Massachusetts to help students document what they have learned and gained through extra curricular activities.

Randy Donant, director of the Student Activities Office, said the second curriculum will serve as a supplement to students' resumes.

"The second curriculum is like a transcript with many uses," Donant said.

The program was developed by the SAO in collaboration with the Student Government Association.

By thoroughly documenting extracurricular experience, students can show prospective employers more than courses taken and jobs held.

"It is more specific than letters of recommendation," Donant said. "It helps students get the jobs they really want."

Donant said interested students can sign up at the Student Activities Office. He explained that once a student chooses to become part of the second curriculum, he/she will meet with a mentor. Through an interview and discussion, the initial curriculum will be developed. Students will then meet with their advisors regularly to assess and update their forms.

Donant said the second curriculum offers both personal growth and career enhancement. "It balances out or increases their skills and is a method to look back at what they have done," he said.

Bill Stepchew, WMUA production manager, thinks the program is "great. It is a means by which a student can expand. It allows students to focus in what they want rather than getting general experience."

Donant said students who have heard of the program are receptive to it. "There is a lot of interest. This is something they can demonstrate," he said.

The second curriculum is also commited to support students' academic program, Donant said. The program acknowledges the need to balance both studies and out of the classroom experience while a student expands his or her education.

Darts Club on target

By JOHN YONCE
Collegian Staff

To "increase awareness of darts on campus" and to attract members, the University of Massachusetts Darts Club sponsored a darts exhibition on the Campus Center concourse yesterday.

The exhibition included a demonstration of a new computerized scoring system, instruction on throwing techniques and a challenge match for prizes between the club's doubles team and spectators.

"Darts are really on the rise. It's an up-and-coming sport," said Glenn Remick, an area manager for the American Darts Organization. "As soon as we set the boards up, students went back to their rooms to get their darts."

Remick said darts are a popular sport in the United States, with "at least five million" players. He said darts are popular at many colleges throughout New England.

The exhibition attracted about 15 people interested in joining the club, which is still in the organizational stages, according to club president Witold Bzdel.

"We're trying to see who's interested in darts at UMass," Bzdel said. "The club has been active on and off for the last few years."

Activities of the club include hosting a playoff tournament to determine representatives to the regional and New England championship tournaments, Bzdel said.

Summer Study in POLAND

The Kosciuszko Foundation is sponsoring eleven summer sessions in Poland, in four cities. Students and adults may participate in these special programs for foreigners conducted at Poland's leading universities and cultural centers. Minimum requirement is 18 years of age and high school graduation. All programs, which are three to six weeks long, include tours of Poland as well as classroom and extracurricular activities. For most programs, no previous knowledge of the Polish language is required, and college credit is available. Complete costs, inclusive of tuition, full room and board, travel within Poland and round-trip transatlantic airfare, are approximately $1,500.*

Keeping our eyes open today, tomorrow and everyday

Andrew M. Paven

The images flicker across the television screen, painful to the conscience of the well-fed viewer. The child, too weak from hunger, cannot shoo off the flies that gather around her mouth, and nose, and eyes — the scavengers already descending upon this as yet undead child.

And the viewer stops, during his evening repast of the leftovers of this year's Thanksgiving, unable to eat more. His appetite lost to the horror of those who have nothing for which to be thankful.

The tragedy of the people of Ethiopia is, in a way, typical of the hypocrisy of the march of technological progress. The march is not lockstep across the vast geography of the world, but often ragged and random. It marches, often, to a drummer measured and all too distant from those who need it most.

The specter of famine in Ethiopia and much of Africa has become front-page, lead-story news to the major American newspapers and television networks in the past few weeks. But the famine is not new. Where was the coverage during the past 10 to 15 years during which time drought and civil strife combined with severe economic recession have laid waste to millions of people? Where was the march of technological progress that might have stemmed this flood-tide of starvation?

While we tinker with the irrigation of human arteries, how much money and time are devoted to the development of irrigation systems for whole countries which, without these systems, cannot possibly hope to sustain their populations? Are these millions somehow expendable in modern society?

I don't wish to stem this tide of progress. I wish, rather, to find some way to even its march. I don't wish to deny life to the grandfather in Louisville's Humana Hospital, but wish to prolong and assure life to those millions who need our wealthy society's help. The millions who will starve in Africa — not only in Ethiopia, but in Angola, Chad, Mozambique, Mali, Senegal and others as well — deserve to reap the fruits and miracles of technological progress as much as artificial heart recipients William Schroeder and Barney Clark do.

We are a society that is capable of putting men and women on the moon, capable of stitching machine-hearts into people, but yet we do not feed those who starve in our own country and around the world.

Where is the charity and compassion which mark this holiday season when the starving are no longer television fare?

During the time between this holiday for giving of thanks and Christmas, relief will no doubt be forthcoming from those for whom the act of giving is a beneficial catharsis. But we must as a society keep our eyes open to those who need our help even after the last of our Christmas trees and New Year's hangovers are but a memory. We must find a way to permanently assure that the economic resources that fund our society's progress be used to help those who are not front-page news as well as those who are.

Random Notes

A stranger in his own town

This weekend, for the first time in nearly a year, I returned to my home town in Vermont, a veritable metropolis of 500, nestled between some of the state's most popular ski regions.

It is a town that is often characterized by such real New Englanders (those who reside off Route 128) as "quaint." To those who grew up here, the word quaint is just another synonym for "stagnant."

As I browsed about the hub of the bustling town — the local reading room that masquerades as a library — a feeling of isolation, of distance enveloped me. The librarian, a woman of 60, who took great pride in never having been outside of the country, asked me why I had wanted to go away to college. When I replied that I wanted to meet new people, try out my own ideas and expand my mind, she quickly ended the conversation and returned to her issue of People magazine.

It was at this point that I began to realize that the town takes great pride in the fact that nothing changes. Comfort is achieved by the belief that tomorrow holds no challenges, that there are no distant horizons to conquer.

As I visited old friends from school I discovered that the "village virus" had already taken hold of many of them. Some were honest enough to accept the fact that at age 22 most of their dreams about the future had died. Others I spoke to said that just as soon as hunting season ended, they were going to strike out on their own and make it big in the real world by moving to Brattleboro.

The small town offers comfort and stability to its residents but it asks for much in return. For one to feel a part of the community, you are asked to surrender your identity and to give up any thoughts of change or improvement. Visitors to the town see only a shallow layer of life in such a village — the peace and quiet and sense of being that all residents seem to have achieved for themselves. Rarely do they detect the price that has been extracted for such solitude.

As I stepped into the half-frozen puddles in a center field that I used to patrol, I could not keep from thinking of how lucky I had been. The rest of the team that I used to play with were all living within three miles of the old playground. At their homes they were raising their own families and transferring the dreams of one generation to the next.

As the weekend came to a close, the sense of isolation that grasped me was now complete. Friends asked about college but never listened to my answers. Relatives questioned my goals and attempted to substitute their own. By Sunday afternoon this Vermont town had led me to conclude that I was no longer welcome. I had changed while away at school, but people back home could not accept this fact. To be an exile in one's home town is a sobering experience.

Crunch, crunch, it's dinnertime

Michael Morris

Now that the excitement of election day has passed, things are beginning to return to normal again, and I am able to turn my attention to a more immediate problem that exists on this campus. Though probably no one has noticed, I am quite in tune to a planned covert invasion and takeover of this campus by a publicly denounced group.

I am convinced that members of this group are living in every dormitory, administrative building, classroom, and dining commons on this campus — not to mention many, if not all, of the off-campus apartment complexes. This group holds most of its activities during the nocturnal hours when they plunder, eat to their hearts content, and no doubt engage in casual sex with many, if not any, available partners. This group, in order to perservere, has even found a way (to the bewilderment of most scientists) to survive a nuclear war! I am talking about the invasion of UMass by the COCKROACHES.

I don't know, is it me? Everywhere I go, they're there! Yesterday while in the men's room at Arnold House (School of Public Health?) I sensed that I was not alone. I looked down, and there was a cockroach so big it could wrestle a cat! Oh, how I love to hear them crackle under my feet. Last week during a marketing presentation I watched a roach quite audaciously parade across the floor, in front of the speaker, over a woman's shoe and then up into her knapsack. God help me, but I couldn't interrupt the class. I don't know, can this be all coincidental? Last year I did battle with a whole colony that partied quite noisily all night long in the janitor's closet (read: garbage room) on my floor. Afterward, the drunk ones, as if coming from J.R.'s, always found their way into my room until I painted the walls of that closet with Raid. Doesn't anybody else have these problems?

This morning was the final straw that tested my tolerance and prompted me to write this column. While attending breakfast at the exquisite Hampshire Commons, located in the pristine Southwest residential area, I found Kenny the Cockroach swimming the crawlstroke around the rim of a glass of apple juice. I kind of chuckled, until his brother Bob made a break for it and scrambled over my toast, around my eggs, and off my tray safely to the underside of the counter. Come on, there's got to be something that can be done to avert this terrorist action.

Since a good portion of these guys crawl out of drain holes, through which you-know-what passes, you can guess that they haven't been soaking their feet in Palmolive. On the contrary, they've got all kinds of unfavorable bacterial strains growing on them. Furthermore, they just love to eat the insulation off of electrical wiring. Sure the final bite is their last, but their burning bodies have been suspect in many electrical fires in old houses.

Speaking of old houses, cockroaches really like Northeast. A woman once remarked to me, "Look at the funny brown bug in my jewelry chest." Funny how they don't bother you when you don't know what they are.

From this discussion, I'd assume that you wouldn't want to find these guys living in a first-aid kit like I did in Boyden last May. So how about it? Are we going to wage an all-out war against these guys? If everybody stepped on one each day we'd be setting them back by 25,000 in only 24 hours. Get out that old can of Raid and do your duty before UMass becomes the cockroach capital of Massachusetts.

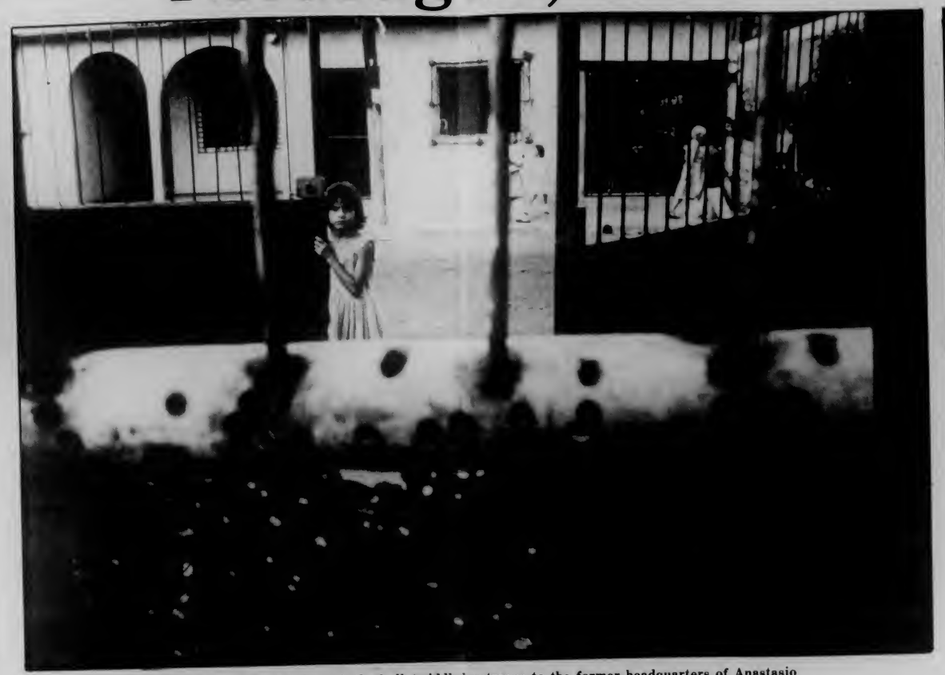
Nicaragua, 1984

Photos copyright 1984 Polumbaum

Children in the Edgar Munguia barrio, a Managua shantytown. In this and other shantytowns, residents have no running water and electricity lines have only recently been connected to a few buildings.

The men in the background are working on a government-sponsored project to build 95 tiny but clean houses, a community center and a school in the barrio. A construction brigade of two dozen Americans is spending this month volunteering help here and in another barrio nearby.



A local child peers through the bullet-riddled entrance to the former headquarters of Anastasio Somoza's National Guard in Leon, the first city taken over by the Sandinistas in June 1979. This building was the Somoza government's last stronghold in the city. According to residents who took part in the Sandinista attack, revolutionaries and guardsmen fought a fierce 15-day battle which ended when 15 officers still alive inside the barracks surrendered.

Below left: Neighborhood artists and visitors from the United States painted this mural overlooking a vacant lot in Leon. "GN" stands for National Guard, ex-members of which form the backbone of the "contra" force.

"Oh, you're norteamericanos," said the man with the paper Sandinista election campaign cap (third from right) when I told him where our tour group was from. "We're waiting for you. We're ready for the invasion."

I responded that I would never come to Nicaragua as a soldier.

"Well, we're ready for Reagan's soldiers," he answered, "and when they come we'll kill them. We beat the National Guard. We beat Somoza. We can beat the imperialists."

Several of his co-workers, joining him on lunch break outside the Managua bus repair yard where aging public transit vehicles spend much of their time, affirmed that they had all fought in the Sandinista revolution. "We were here killing Somocistas together," one said.

Can the revolution survive?

Nicaragua's Sandinistas are still struggling to consolidate their revolution five years after overthrowing dictator Anastasio Somoza DeBayle, whose family had ruled the country since 1933 under United States tutelage.

Today they face an economy crippled by shortages and lack of foreign exchange, an embargo on consumer goods and spare parts imposed by the United States and some of its allies, and a capital city, Managua, which has yet to be completely rebuilt after a 1972 earthquake.

They also face a "contra" guerrilla war guided and financed by the Central Intelligence Agency and the Reagan Administration, which maintains that the Sandinistas are creating a totalitarian communist state and seeking to topple other Central American governments. Reagan claims Nicaragua is funneling arms to rebels in El Salvador.

The "contras" have claimed some 10,000 lives out of a population of 2.8 million since 1981, but have failed to gain control of any inhabited territory, concentrating instead on quick strikes against economic and communications targets.

This past November 4, the Sandinistas held the first elections since the revolution, which were dismissed by President Reagan as a "Soviet-style sham." Seven of Nicaragua's 11 political parties participated; one of these officially withdrew, but members still ran for (and won some) assembly seats. Four other parties boycotted the election saying the government had failed to provide the conditions necessary for fair voting.

The Sandinistas cited opposition party meetings with the U.S. embassy and reports that the CIA had offered money in exchange for nonparticipation as evidence that the boycott was part of an American campaign to discredit the election.

With 84 percent of eligible voters casting ballots, the Sandinistas won 64 percent of the vote — rather than the 90 percent they had predicted — and government coordinator Daniel Ortega Saavedra was elected president.

Pointing to U.S. mining of the port of Corinto last January, a CIA manual advising the "contras" in terrorism techniques, and American supersonic reconnaissance planes flying over Nicaragua and frightening the population with "sonic booms," Ortega has asserted with increasing alarm that the U.S. is preparing to launch an invasion.

Three weeks ago, the State Department speculated that Nicaragua had received Soviet MiG-21 warplanes, which President Reagan would consider a "very serious" threat to regional security. The charge turned out to be unfounded, and Ortega responded to American warships in Nicaraguan waters and more U.S. intelligence flights by calling a full military alert. Rumors that the U.S. had bombed a Soviet freighter provoked demonstrations at the University of Massachusetts and elsewhere.

Juan Loaisiga of Leon revisits a jail cell a few kilometers from where his family lives in which he was imprisoned for six months in 1978 after throwing three homemade bombs at National Guardsmen.

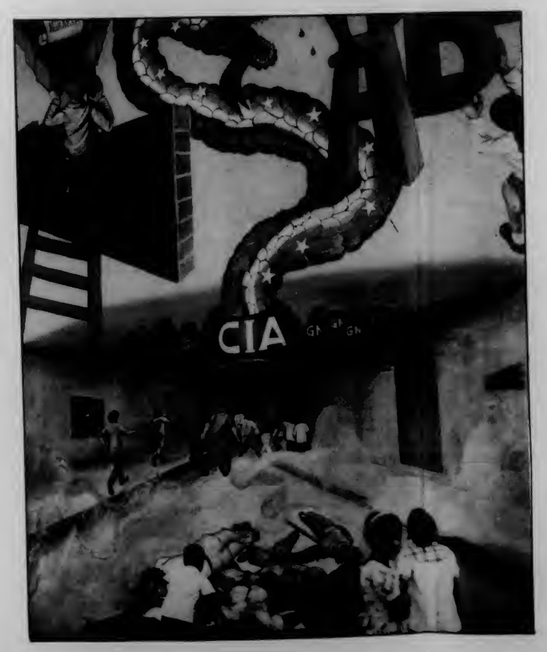
The Sandinista government maintains the roofless, gutted jail as a monument to prisoners who were slaughtered by guards shortly before the revolutionaries captured the building in June 1979.

The high walls are scratched with prisoners' graffiti. No obscenities, just names and slogans like "enough oppression already" and "locked up without guilt." Loaisiga never wrote his name there.

"They stuck me in here with fifty men in one cell (about twelve feet square)," Loaisiga says. "There was no space for anybody to sit down. They never let anyone out except to question them or torture them."

Loaisiga says he never got tortured. "I was lucky. I lost two cousins and a brother here; they were tortured until they died."

"They never gave me sentence. After six months, they let me go because there wasn't enough space for everyone."



A lawyer from the United States points out northern border regions where he took affadavits from villagers on sabotage, killings, kidnappings and rapes committed by U.S.-backed "contra" guerrillas. The American firm he works for asked that his identity be kept secret to protect him from reprisal, noting that the contras have assassinated Nicaraguan election workers, teachers and other professionals.

"In the north, nobody leaves their town at night," the lawyer said. "In Region 1 alone (three northwestern provinces constituting one military zone), there have been 1,300 kidnappings since the contra war began (in 1981). Normally the contra strategy is to take as many people as they can.

"Usually young men and women are kidnapped — the men to fight with the contras, the women to be raped. Of all the women who had been kidnapped that we were able to talk to, only one said she had not been raped. One woman was raped, by her own account, at least 40 times in front of her husband; they had come north to look at land they received under the government's land reform program."

The lawyer said he spent several weeks around the town of Jalapa, where "it is rare to meet someone who hasn't lost at least one member of their family to the contras. A more publicized story recently was the killing of six children (which was on the front page of two Managua dailies and related in some U.S. newspapers). But this kind of thing happens frequently."

Collegian staff member Ian Polumbaum and his father Ted, a freelance photographer, recently spent a week touring Nicaragua with twenty American journalists, students, teachers and other professionals. They brought back these images and information.

Arts

Of Mozart and madness

By ELAINE SENAY
Collegian Staff

Amadeus is a lavish adaptation of the popular Paul Shaffer play. Director Milos Forman is no stranger to the problems of bringing a vivid play to the screen. He has attempted it before with his version of Hair. Forman has succeeded partially but he still cannot gather the various elements of the story and the characters to offer up a cohesive film. He is able to weave extensive excerpts of Mozart's music without inducing boredom.

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart is played by Tom Hulce who some may remember as one of the Delta fraternity pledges in Animal House. Hulce portrays Mozart as a spoiled, vulgar brat who allows his ego and obsessions to be used against him. Hulce is full of earnest energy as he races all over Vienna wearing pseudo punk powdered wigs.

The film's greatest asset is F. Murray Smith as Salieri, the mediocre Court composer who becomes Mozart's bitter enemy. Salieri in old age is the narrator of the film recounting the rise of Mozart in the Viennese Court and his tortured death. The composer is convinced that he was responsible for driving the young man to his death. Smith as Salieri is just the right mixture of honey and venom who feels he has been wronged by God because he can never be as great as Mozart.

Amadeus reaches to the opposite end of acting ability with the poor performance by Elizabeth Berridge. Berridge as Constanzia Mozart speaks like a twentieth century American instead of an eighteenth century Austrian. She is able to project the young and naive wife but her dialogue is out of step with that of the other characters.

The film is a treat because it includes performances of Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro" and "Don Giovanni." Yet Amadeus never goes beyond the process of storytelling. Director Forman has to take care of the lush production around the plot and as a result the characters are neglected. They remain shallow and it is hard to feel anything for them. By the end of the film, it is easy to appreciate Mozart's ability to write a Requiem Mass without the use of a piano or other musical instrument. Yet it is difficult to believe that this project killed him. Amadeus is entertaining but it has too much to accomplish in three hours.

Sarah Vaughn will perform at the Fine Arts Center on Saturday, Dec. 1, at 8 p.m. For tickets call 545-2511.

Author unites women through her work

By MARANN CASSELL
Collegian Staff

"The book helped me to claim a voice of my own, to write what I felt and not what I was taught in English classes. It connected me with other women of color and the women's movement," said Aurora Levins-Morales.

In a world where women of color are faced with various callenges that can cause one to lose hope, women like Aurora Levins Morals, a Puerto Rican Jewish writer tells her story, encouraging other women to climb that adventurous ladder, with God's help.

In an interview at Hampshire College last week Levins-Morales, discussed her experiences and goals as a woman writer and what it is to be both Puerto Rican and Jewish.

"I am trying to write for myself and for women of color, to talk about our realities, and to get that out and published," she said.

"I see my own work helping me to be more whole (person). Then, when I write about my own experiences through that, I form a way of connecting people of color," she said. Levins said that being both Puerto Rican and Jewish was an ardent struggle for self-identity.

"I had to struggle with a split identity and to understand that I'm not a split person but a whole person. I had to analyze what I like and didn't like and see where the strengths and weaknesses were particularly towards Latin women. Because if I were going to fully love myself as a Latina I had to look at all that stuff," she said.

Levins feels that one of the ways in which she kept her sanity was writing about her experiences in The Bridge Call My Back, a book of writing by radical women of color. "The book helped me to claim a voice of my own, to write what I felt and not what I was taught in English classes. It connected me with other women of color and the women's movement.

As a woman of color and a writer Levins feels that she has a duty to society, "my responsibility is to teach what I do and to use my writings to reflect back to people their own perceptions, realities and experiences." Levins also feels that she has a responsibility to write about experiences of people who don't get represented fairly by the media.

Levins' writings were mostly influenced by her parents, relatives and her cultural background.

Presently, she's working on a book about a mother and daughter relationship and a book about a girl growing up in the Puerto Rican mountains in the 1930s called The Women of The Mountains of Puerto Rico.

"I hope to reflect that experience without romanticizing it and not demeaning the people," she said.

LISTEN TO THIS, RICK. REAGAN ALSO RECEIVED 61% OF THE ELDERLY VOTE, 56% OF THE YOUTH VOTE, AND 67% OF THE YUPPIE VOTE!!
DUANE, WHY ARE YOU STILL TORTURING YOURSELF WITH ELECTION RESULTS? IT'S OVER, MAN!
RICK, IN THE LAST EIGHT YEARS, I'VE HANDLED SYMBOLS FOR CARTER, BROWN AND MONDALE. I'M NOT EXACTLY ON A WINNING STREAK. I'VE GOT TO FIGURE OUT WHERE WE WENT WRONG!
I STILL CAN'T HELP FEELING THAT ALL WE NEEDED THIS FALL WAS ONE BREAK. SOMETHING THAT WOULD'VE DRAMATIZED THE CASE AGAINST REAGAN.
I DUNNO. A NUCLEAR WAR OR SOMETHING LIKE WHAT?
BY GOD, THAT WOULD HAVE DONE IT! I'LL BET YOU WOULD HAVE SWEPT BOTH HOUSES!
I DON'T KNOW, RICK. WITH A BLOW OUT LIKE REAGAN'S, IT'S HARD TO FIND A SILVER LINING. I FEEL LIKE I'VE TOTALLY WASTED THE LAST THREE YEARS OF MY LIFE!
HEY, C'MON, DUANE. YOU WERE RESPONSIBLE FOR SOME MAJOR THEMATIC BREAKTHROUGHS THIS ELECTION! LIKE FERRARO! THAT WAS A VERY GUTSY CHOICE.
YOU TOOK A GREEN, BRASSY NO-NAME FROM QUEENS AND MADE HER ONE OF THE MOST IMPORTANT SYMBOLS OF THE DECADE!
YEAH. IF ONLY SHE HADN'T BEEN A WOMAN.

Minutemen shoot down Stonehill

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

SPRINGFIELD — The University of Massachusetts' basketball team had a night class in Springfield yesterday, and learned a lesson coach Ron Gerlufsen hopes they won't forget.

The Minutemen opened their season with a 71-69 victory over persistent Stonehill last night in the Springfield Civic Center before a vocal crowd of 2,283.

"We learned a lot in this game," Gerlufsen said. "We had a chance to blow them out, but we let them back in it with our impatience. We did some things well, we didn't do some things well. I would've liked to have won by more than two points, but considering we played a lot of people and it was our first game I can't complain."

Senior forward and co-captain Horace Neysmith scored 20 points on 7-of-12 shooting. He also grabbed 12 rebounds and had four assists, in 38 minutes.

Sophomore point guard Carl Smith added 12 points on 4-of-5 shooting. He dished out five assists. Senior forward Ron Young had ten points with Bobby Braun contributing nine points and eight rebounds.

For the Chiefs, 1-2, George Leonard came off the bench to score 22 points. Guard Peter Krause had 17.

In the first half, the Minutemen came away with a 34-33 lead thanks to a ten point run that gave UMass a 22-16 lead with 8:41 left in the half.

Stonehill's triangle-in-two zone defense gave the Minutemen some trouble as the Chiefs used 12 Krause points to stay with the Minutemen.

The second half saw UMass run out to a 46-35 lead thanks to four points from Neysmith and a solid man-to-man defense.

UMass built up a 14 point lead with 10:13 to go in the game as freshman guard Matt Ryan banked a ten footer in the lane.

The Minutemen were also aided by strong foul shooting as Neysmith and Smith combined to go 6 for 6 from the line.

A beautiful Smith-to-Neysmith "look out below" alley-oop slam incited the crowd with 2:37 to go in the game. But Stonehill stayed within striking distance, as UMass couldn't build its lead up past eight points.

Young sank two free throws and hit a jumper to put UMass up 69-62 with only 39 seconds to play. It should've ended the game, but...the chiefs then ran off five straight points in 17 seconds to put a scare into UMass. A five second violation, as freshman Lorenzo Sutton was late calling a time out, forced Gerlufsen to bring Neysmith, Smith and Donald Russell (9 points) back after curtain calls with UMass ahead 69-65. Two Young free throws with six seconds left after a Leonard jumper secured the victory. Krause cruised in for the dunk for the final margin.

"Our starting guards (Smith and Russell) were a little too confident and the freshmen (Ryan and Sutton) were in the game when we took the big lead," Gerlufsen said. "The starters were too impatient with the ball, loooking for the spectacular shot instead of the easy one."

The Minutemen shot a poor 45 percent from the floor, attributable to first game rustiness. UMass was 21 of 30 from the line

UMass forward Bobby Braun goes up for a rebound against Stonehill in the Springfield Civic Center. UMass beat the Chiefs, 71-69.

MINUTEMEN MUMBLINGS: Neysmith tossed an airball on his first free throw but went on go to six-of-ten from the line. UMass has a committment from a 6-5 forward from Washington's Dunbar High, one of the nation's top prep schools for basketball. The recruit is one of America's top players in high school. No buses went to Springfield as not enough students signed up...but frosty Miller Beer was for sale in the Civic Center... a footnote many UMass students will appreciate.

Horace Neysmith: 'on a mission'

By GERRY deSIMAS
Collegian Staff

SPRINGFIELD — The man is on a mission. And you better not stand in his way.

"He's our bread and butter man," University of Massachusetts men's basketball coach Ron Gerlufsen said about senior forward Horace Neysmith last night after the Minutemen held off pesky Stonehill, 71-69, in their season opener at the Springfield Civic Center.

"He's our Tony Dorsett. In key situations we will go to him," Gerlufsen said.

Neysmith, with a team-high 20 points and 12 rebounds, is the man Gerlufsen wants to have the ball. And the senior co-captain wants it too.

"The coach wanted us to go down low (and inside to the big man) as much as we could early," Neysmith said. And they did as Neysmith scored the game's first two points on a baseline drive.

But the Minutemen, who won their second consecutive season opener (the first time since the Jack Leaman years of 1977-78), didn't get the ball to their 6-5 forward as much as Gerlufsen would have liked.

"The team has to recognize a star," the second year coach said. "There are certain times that the ball just has to get to him (Neysmith). He could have been more efficient tonight but the team has to realize they have to get the ball to him more often."

Neysmith was a factor in the two UMass spurts that propelled them ahead of the Division II Chieftains. Neysmith scored four inside points in UMass' 10 point first half spurt and four more in the Minuteman's 10-2 run to open the second half.

And the forward controlled the boards for UMass gathering in a team-high twelve bounds with Bobby Braun getting in eight.

"I'm on a mission," Neysmith said. "I just want to play as well and as consistently as I can and help the team win as many games as possible."

The big man from Jamaica, New York, who was snubbed from the pre-season Atlantic 10 all-conference squads, provided the 2,282 fans with some rim-clanging excitement taking a high alley-oop pass from Carl Smith with 2:37 to go and slamming it home for a 65-58 lead.

"That wasn't even supposed to be for me," Neysmith said with a grin.

The man with a mission had to feel that his mission was accomplished last night. "It wasn't the cleanest game but we won and that's all that counts," Neysmith said. One mission accomplished, at least 27 more to go.

Women drop opener

Eagles take advantage of poor shooting

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

As offensive minded as the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team may be this season, one basic principle still exists in basketball, you have to shoot well to win.

The Minutemen didn't shoot well against Boston College on Saturday night at Amherst College and the Eagles came away with a season opening 66-58 win over UMass.

A sparse crowd of 277 saw UMass shoot 10 for 32 in the second half and only 40 percent for the game. The Minutemen were 10 for 20 from the line and three starters, captain Jerrie Bernier, Rebecca Kucks and Susan Burtoft were a combined 0 for 12 from the floor. Burtoft had three points from the line.

The Eagles had five players in double figures led by center Jane Haubrich and Pam Thorton with 13 apiece.

UMass guard Barbara Hebel had a game-high 14 on seven for 11 shooting. Freshman Tara Lewis added 13 with five-of-nine shooting while Karen Dammringer contributed 10 points. Freshman Juanita Matthews had eight points.

Boston College led 37-31 at halftime and the Minutemen, thanks to the terrible shooting, couldn't catch the Eagles in the second half. BC shot only 46 percent (24-of-53) in the game as both teams struggled.

Lewis had nine rebounds in her college debut with Burtoft grabbing six boards. UMass played 11 women with the Eagles using only three reserves in the game.

The Minutemen will face Florida at Amherst College on Thursday at 8 p.m..

BYU holds on to No. 1, but Sooners close the gap

(AP) Brigham Young held onto its No. 1 ranking in The Associated Press college football poll Monday but runner-up Oklahoma closed the gap appreciably.

BYU, which became No. 1 last week for the first time ever, completed a 12-0 regular season by defeating Utah State 38-13.

Meanwhile, Oklahoma downed third-ranked Oklahoma State 21-14 to earn a share of the Big Eight crown with Nebraska and a trip to the Orange Bowl. The Sooners, 9-1-1, received 18 1-2 first-place votes and 1,128 1/2 points.

Florida moved up from fourth to third with five first place votes and 1,048 points. The Gators, who were ruled ineligible for a bowl game last week by the Southeastern Conference after winning the SEC championship, are 8-1-1.

Washington, (10-1) Oklahoma's Orange Bowl opponent, climbed from fifth place to fourth with one first-place ballot.

Sugar Bowl-bound Nebraska, 9-2, vaulted from seventh place to fifth with 939 points.

Texas, No. 6 last week, was upset by Baylor 24-10 and skidded to 13th place with a 7-2-1 record. Meanwhile, Rose Bowl-bound Ohio State, 9-2, rose from eighth to sixth with 837 points.

South Carolina's 22-21 triumph over Clemson enabled the 10-1 Gamecocks to jump from ninth to seventh with 830 points. Boston College's dramatic 47-45 last-second victory over Miami jumped the 8-2 Eagles from 10th to eight with 764 points, barely in front of 9-2 Oklahoma State, which received 762 points. OSU will play South Carolina in the Gator Bowl.

Southern Methodist, 11th last week, defeated Arkansas 31-28 and received 612 points to round out the Top Ten.

Happy hours banned after Dec. 10

By MARY CRESSE
Collegian Staff

"What can you do? The regulation has clearly stabilized prices so people won't go across town for a deal anymore."

—Bar owner Bob Ross

The decision is final. Happy hours are banned in Massachusetts and despite complaints from students, local merchants are not only compliant but happy to change their drink menus.

"It really is the best thing," said Justin Ryan's owner Bob Ross. "Not too long ago you'd have people driving from drink special to drink special at the bars around town. This way, people will have a tendency to stay where they are and not emerge every night as drunk as they would before the regulation."

In an effort "aimed solely at ending once and for all things that encourage drinking," Governor Michael S. Dukakis signed into effect last Friday a regulation restricting the sale or practice of many drink specials. Among the prohibitions to go into effect Dec 10:

- No free drinks
- No sale of more than two drinks to one person
- No sale of unlimited drinks at fixed prices
- No sale of drinks at reduced prices to a particular group
- No sale of drinks lower than listed price.

In other words, no more Pub Mug Night, no more JR's Monday night fifty cent drafts, no more two-for-ones, ladies' nights or Judie's dollar drinks.

While most Amherst bar owners opposed initial efforts to ban happy hours town by town, more of them approve the anti-drunk driving effort since the ban has gone statewide.

"Say happy hours were banned in Amherst," said Delano's owner and Amherst Chamber of Commerce president Chick Delano, "you'd have people driving over to say, Hadley to drink and then they'd be driving back drunk from Hadley. In my view, that's as good as signing your own death certificate.

Delano's is replacing its popular two for one drink special with a 16 oz. glass-any drink -and charging one price that will remain the same all day-in effect, one day-long happy hour.

And as bars stray from the "beat the clock" type drinking, others realize the benefits -- and necessities -- of attracting a crowd with non-alcoholic offerings.

"What can you do?" said Bob Ross. "The regulation has clearly stabilized prices, so people won't go across town for a deal anymore.

Delanos plans to add more items to their night menu.

Optional offerings may be good for Delano's and Justin Ryan's but financial death for The Blue Wall, which has had low drink prices for years. The restaurant manager Mary Bourret said, will suffer terribly with the loss of entertainer Cliff Myers, the bars biggest draw. Myers used to entertain at the Friday Happy hour's but his contract was terminated.

"We'll be eliminating the lower prices on Friday because of the regulation, but that's not why we'll be losing business," she said. Bourret approves of the rule, and so does the Blue Wall. Every year it hosts an alcohol awareness day.

Student conduct policy in limbo

Revisions expected Dec. 22

By BOB BURGESS
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts administrators and student government leaders, who began work last spring to update the code of Student Conduct, have yet to meet this semester to finish with the necessary revisions although a Dec. 22 deadline has been set.

According to associate dean of students Robert Brooks, he and Dean of Students William Field met "four or five times" this summer with student government leaders to complete a final draft of the code, which is the final word on campus rules, regulations and judicial procedures.

"We have planned three or four meetings between now and the end of the semester," Brooks said, "and hope to have a mutually agreeable draft by Dec. 22. The biggest problem we face is time."

Student Government Association co-president Rick Patrick said yesterday that although he and the other student representatives have not met with administrators this semester, they have been meeting together regularly to approve the student requests in the code.

The code has not been revised for about 25 years, and both students and administrators agree that it is badly outdated.

Brooks said yesterday that a "total revision" is necessary for the code to represent students "of this century."

For example, Patrick said, "We have already agreed that it is illegal for a student to carry a machete around on campus."

The areas where the students and administrators disagree are many, however.

The "academic integrity" of the code, which concerns the degree of punishment a student can be dealt for cheating on a test, is one area of disagreement. According to Brooks, he and Field want the new draft to be more concerned with education, and not discipline.

"What good does it do a student to cheat on tests, and not be punished for it? He's the one who should be learning," Brooks said.

Another area of disagreement is the "jeopardy" section, Brooks said. He said "jeopardy" should be "like a suspension (from the university) suspended." The administration plan "would allow the student who violated the code to stay in school, but if that student committted another violation, he/she would be suspended."

Brooks said the present procedure allows a student to go basically unpunished for further infractions. The new reading puts"some teeth into the 'jeopardy' section," Brooks said.

Brooks also said that although he had not expected the revision process to take this long, "nothing is terribly lost by the extended time. . . many of the people involved fear that if we don't take our time to make sure it is right, we may be sued."

One more area of disagreement rests with student representation at disciplinary hearings. The administration feels that a student can have a lawyer but the lawyer cannot address the disciplinary board. The students feel this is contrary to a fair hearing, Patrick said.

Some tax deductions may be cut

WASHINGTON—The Treasury Department recommended on Tuesday a sweeping overhaul of the income tax that would finance new rate reductions by eliminating many popular deductions. The Treasury estimated 78 percent of Americans would pay less or the same under the plan.

President Reagan said the proposal meets his demand for simplification without being "a tax increase in disguise." He promised to carefully review the thick report and public reaction to it before sending his version to Congress early next year.

The proposal was unveiled at a news conference by Treasury Secretary Donald T. Regan. "This will go a long way to assure any American that the other person is being taxed on the same basis as he or she is," he said.

The plan would double the $1,000 personal exemptions; increase the standard deductions; slash the maximum individual tax rate now 50 percent to 35 percent; limit to $5,000 the writeoff for interest other than a home mortgage, and wipe out the deduction now permitted for state and local income taxes.

The "marriage penalty" deduction of up for $3,000 for two-earner couples would be killed, as would the deduction for state and local taxes.

Minors caught drinking must pay

Boston - Underaged drinkers found guilty of buying alcohol could receive an alternative sentence of community work instead of just a fine, under a bill signed Tuesday by Gov. Michael S. Dukakis.

The bill, sponsored by Rep. John Businger, D-Brookline, also was broadened to allow judges to give an alternative sentence to anyone put on probation, usually for a misdemeanor offense.

Businger said he filed a bill on behalf of a Brookline liquor store owner who had trouble with neighborhood youths. He said the new law would address a situation where youthful offenders would just receive a fine for an infraction, and their parents would wind up paying the fine.

The new law, which goes into effect in 90 days, calls for a judge to sentence a violator to at least 25 hours of community service, in addition to other punishment, for an initial infraction, at least 50 hours for a second offense and 100 hours for a third offense.

Mystery NY lottery winner forfeits $1.7 million

ALBANY, N.Y.- A mystery lottery player has forfeited a $1.7 million prize to New York state because he or she failed to come forward with the winning ticket within one year of buying it at a liquor store.

But in the three weeks before the deadline, the missing ticket was publicized, and "hundreds of people came in with all sorts of stories saying they had lost the ticket and wanted the money" said Steven Nannariello, whose store sold the ticket. "It was unbelievable."

Plastic heart patient requests beer

LOUSIVILLE, Ky.—William J. Schroeder, speaking for the first time since his dying heart was replaced with a plastic pump, asked for a can of beer Tuesday, and his doctor said he might be able to leave the hospital by Christmas.

Dr. William C. DeVries, in his first meeting with reporters since the surgery, said Schroeder's new heart was "working beautifully," although he cautioned that infections or other complications could occur suddenly.

"You live on the edge of a possible disaster like that all the time," he said.

Asked when Schroeder might be able to leave the hospital, DeVries said, "I hope before Christmas, but I think that's very optimistic on my part."

When Schroeder, 52, is released from the Humana Hospital Audubon, he will move into a house in Louisville rather than to his Indiana home 90 miles away, so that doctors can watch his recovery closely.

"I'd like a can of beer," he quoted Schroeder as saying. DeVries gave him ice chips, and Schroeder was later given clear fluids.

New Regents members better represent women, minorities

By MICHELLE HYDE
Collegian Staff

With the appointment of six new members to the Board of Regents last July by Michael S. Dukakis, the board will more accurately reflect the state population's interests, better representing women and minorities, according to administrators in the governor's and regent's offices.

After only two meetings, some regents say it is too early to make an assessment of the new board. But other related to the regents say the new board is more education oriented and less high technology oriented than the previous board.

Donna Hartlage, the legislative liason between the governor and the regents said the new regents are in a position to fully understand and confront issues like accessiblity to low and middle income students and minorities, and the quality of education.

While 14 of the previous board's 15 members were men who were from predominantly high technology backgrounds, the new board includes four women who reflect the interests of women, minorities, small business, labor and private education as well as high technology, Hartlage said. Hartlage coordinates the new regent appointees.

Mary Lou Anderson, one of the new appointees, is the director of the Center for Child Care and Development Inc. in Fall River and has been a community activist there. Another appointee, Elizabeth Rollins, is the dean of Simmons College, a woman's college in Boston and is "a very outspoken advocate of women and minorities," Hartlage said.

The same is true of Dr. Hassan Minor, Hartlage said. Minor is the managing director of the Corporation for Boston, an organization dedicated to enhancing the communications of different sectors of Boston.

Paul Ylvisaker, the Charles William Eliot Professor of Education at Harvard University is an advocate of a strong educational policy

With the organizational problems and "major issues" like the closing of Boston State College and its consolidation with the University of Massachusetts/Boston ironed out, the regents can now begin to work on more substantial and long term goals, according to Estelle Shanley, a regent administrator.

Paul Marks, another recent appointee, and founder of Paul Marks, Inc., a general business consulting firm, said the new board will concentrate on minority enrollment and retention, doubling the size of the college library appropriations from four to eight million, and increasing funding for scholarships.

Former professor, 79, dies

Ferenc Vali, 79, the first professor emeritus from the University of Massachusetts, died Nov. 19 in Northampton after a long illness.

Vali joined the political science faculty at the University in 1961, and taught international law, international relations, and Soviet and Eastern European politics.

Although he retired in 1975, Vali continued to teach some courses at UMass and at Florida International University.

Vali was born in Budapest, Hungary in 1905, and he taught at the University of Budapest until 1949, when he was imprisoned for anti-communist activities for five years. His wife was imprisoned for three years. They escaped from Hungary in 1957, and came to the United States.

He was the author of many books and articles, including "Rift and Revolt in Hungary: Nationalism vs. Communism," and "A Bridge Across Bosporus: Foreign Policy of Turkey."

Vali was also a visiting professor at the University of Istanbul in Turkey and was a diplomat in Turkey representing the Hungarian government.

He received a law degree from the University of Budapest in 1927, and a doctorate from the University of London in 1932.

He leaves his wife, the former Rose Nagel.

Parking prohibitions begin Dec. 1

Amherst Police will begin ticketing and towing cars that are parked all night on Dec. 1. The all-night parking prohibition will be in effect until April 1, police said.

Three women were arrested Monday night and charged with larceny under $100 after they were apprehended on North Pleasant Street with a stolen "pedestrian crossing" sign, Amherst police said.

The women are all UMass students.

There were two minor accidents in Amherst, Monday. A car driven by a 29-year-old Sunderland woman was rear-ended by another automobile at 8:20 a.m. on Route 116 near Meadow Street. There were no injuries or citations.

Another accident on Governor's Drive and Eastman Lane occurred at 6:53 p.m. Monday when a car driven by a 30-year-old Amherst resident was struck by another car, driven by a 27-year-old Chicago native. Neither driver was injured.

An automobile parked on the entrance road to Amherst Regional High School since Nov. 23 was broken into, police said. Approximately $350 worth of tools were reported missing Monday, police said.

Feminism, economic realities' are base of Yale union strike

By LAURA KOESTER

Richard Wolff

The women's movement and harsh economic realities in New Haven, Conn. are the major factors behind the strike of 1500 technical and clerical local 34 union workers at Yale University, according to University of Massachusetts economics professor Richard D. Wolff, who spoke to a group of 40 in the Campus Center yesterday.

"What you have is the second richest university in the seventh poorest city in the country. The strike is a culmination of these dichotomies" Wolff said.

Wolff said, "Feminism in general has played a great role. Many union members were touched by the women's movement in college." Local 34 is 82 percent women, and the major issue is comparable worth, said by many to be the major labor issue of the 1980s. The average salary in the union is $13,000 per year , according to Wolff.

Wolff said, "Feminism in general has economics from Yale and who has been a New Haven resident for twenty years, was hired by the union to conduct an independent investigation of Yale's financial health.

Local 34 has on two different occasions reduced its wage demands, but the university insists that its last offer was final due to financial constraints. "This is clearly not a strike over money. Last year alone, Yale ran a surplus of 35 million dollars. The total surplus for the last five years is 148 million. Last year's surplus was plowed back into Yale's endowment. They classify this as an expense, which allows them to say they have a balanced budget,"Wolff said.

"The university has six times the amount of revenue for a population of 15,000 than the city has for a community of 125,000" Wolff said.

Wolff estimated Yale's total wealth at three to six billion dollars. "Classes proceed, research goes on. The strike has not halted the funtioning of the university, although it has caused a lot of disruption and inconvenience to the students," Wolff said.

'It's a dungeon down here'

Hassling heat haunts Goodell library

By IAN POLUMBAUM
Collegian Staff

A broken air line caused the heat in Goodell Library to turn on full blast yesterday, forcing many students to flee in search of less sweltering places to study.

George Shifflett, a Physical Plant systems engineer, said Robert D. Howland of the Telecommunications Office on the sixth floor of Goodell called him shortly before noon to complain about the heat

Howland could not be reached for comment, but telecommunications employees said the temperature in their office reached 89 degrees.

Physical Plant workers discovered that a hydraulic line leading from the basement to the heating system controls on the roof had split Steam valves then opened all the way an automatic "fail safe" response to keep steam moving through pipes and prevent them from freezing, Shifflett said.

"We call that 'wild operation' when it's wide open and we don't have any control over it," he said.

The workers repaired the line and shut off the steam, Shifflet said, but not before scores of students had packed up their books and left. Library employees opened door and windows and set up fans to draw in 45-degree air from outside.

"No way can I study in there," an engineering student said as he headed out the front door.

Employees and many students doing research had no choice but to stay and sweat it out.

"I just keep going," shrugged Smith College student Adele Amadeo as she searched for magazines in the subterranean bound periodicals room. "Neilsen Library (at Smith) is like this a lot, but not as hot, Amadeo said.

"It's a dungeon down here," said an employee in the bound periodical room who declined to be identified. "It's just a big basement with no windows, so there's no air."

"It's definitely hot. You fall asleep," freshman computer science major John Fisher said as he paused from reshelving reserve materials.

Across from the reserve counter, two students were slumped over their desks.

Escort service available on campus

By SANDRA DIAS
Collegian Correspondent

In an attempt to provide security for students, staff and faculty traveling on campus at night, the student security organization in the Department of Public Safety at the University of Massachusetts formed an Escort Service in October of 1983.

The service was originally staffed by volunteers with escorts earning class credits for their time, according to Student Security Coordinator Carol Radzik.

The service has since grown in stature and the escorts now earn a weekly wage instead of academic credit. Applicants are interviewed and brief background checks are performed for safety purposes, Radzik said.

Radzik said the service employs about thirty escorts and averages about five to ten calls a night. The escorts also perform routine security checks on all university dormitories.

The service functions on a phone-in basis. The escorts meet the person requesting an escort and accompany him or her to a dormitory, building, car, or anywhere on campus, she said. All escorts are equipped with flashlights and two-way radios in contact with the Student Security office.

"Students who have weekly night classes can call in advance to make an escort reservation," Radzik said.

Located in Dickinson Hall, the Escort Service is open Sunday through Saturday, from 7 p.m. until 1 a.m. Any university student, faculty, or staff member in need of an escort can call the office at 545-2123.

Drug O.D. treated in Northampton

A University Apartments resident was rushed to Cooley Dickenson Hospital in Northampton for a drug overdose at 7:20 a.m. Monday, UMass police reported. Police said the person was treated at the hospital and will remain there for observation.

A wallet, two jackets, and a sweater, all valued at $387 were reported stolen at Cape Cod Lounge in the Student Union Building, police said. Police said a female student left the items in the lounge and she returned two hours later and found the items missing.

Police said they have a description from passersby of a suspicious person reportedly hiding in bushes between the Whitmore Administration Building and Herter Hall around 8:00 p.m. Monday. The man reportedly didn't bother anyone.

Panel urges 55 MPH speed limit be kept

WASHINGTON (AP) - A federal panel urged keeping the national 55 mph speed limit Tuesday as "one of the most effective highway safety policies ever adopted," but left for Congress to decide whether to raise the limit on some lightly traveled interstate highways in rural areas.

"Decreasing compliance along with slipping public support and an apparent lack of support in some state legislatures, could ultimately lead to the nullification of this law," the panel told Congress in a 254-page report.

A special, 19-member committee of the national research Council, an arm of the National Academy of Sciences, noted that in the decade since the 55 mph speed limit was imposed by Congress, public support for it has declined and violations by motorists are increasing.

"Compliance with the law has declined markedly in recent years," the report said, with much of the opposition to the 55 mph limit coming from rural Western states where travel over long stretches of relatively safe, divided highways is customary.

Some members of the panel adamantly favored raising the speed limit, probably to 65 mph, on sections of rural highway that are lightly traveled and built to accommodate higher speeds safely, the report said.

Alan A. Altshuler, dean of the graduate school of public administration at New York University and chairman of the committee, refused at a newsconference to say how many panelists favored exempting some stretches of rural highway from the 55 mph limit.

OPINION

The opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the university unless otherwise noted.

The politics of madness

Sal Assad

Reagan has represented the rise of a new trend in America. The new right-wing politics is not merely the expression of the man's mental sterility, lack of competence, and endemic amnesia.

The trends represented by Reagan and Bush, their implication in national politics, the rise of racial bigotry and sexism, abrogation of government obstacles to the "natural" destruction of our environment and deregulation of all regulatory agencies (EPA, Nuclear Regulatory Commission, NCR, etc...), plans to eliminate the minimum wage, to dismantle the Department of Education, to equate abortion with murder, expressed hostility to the gay rights movements, return of school prayers, reinstitution of capital punishment, end to school desegregation, opposition to the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA), thus making a total mockery of half of our population, and exhorbitant multi-billion dollar machinery (our "defense" build-up), refusal to sponsor a National Health Plan, hostility to senior citizens, more tax breaks for major private corporations, promotion of international terrorism in Nicaragua, and support of a murderous right-wing dictatorship in El Salvador, in the pursuit of an aggressive hawkish war mongerous foreign policy which is leading us to disaster in Central America and potential catastrophe with an insane star-war program, are all part of a concerted effort by the Big business-government alliance bent on moving towards a totalitarian society.

Reagan has been scaling down or abolishing regulations (which were originally set up to minimally safeguard and protect the people and the environment, against the profit mongerous corporations), so that private enterprise can flourish and make high profit like the "good old days," when "America was great."

The problem with the adaged "Good Old Days/ Golden Age" propoganda jargon, (an illusion shared also by many liberals), is that no one really remembers them except the corporate and multi-national tycoons and magnates who were reaping unprecedented profits from ruthless exploitation and oppression, at home and abroad.

On top of all this, add the artificial commercial-cultural quip "America is not going to be pushed around anymore;" a bold-faced lie and distortion cast in a reflection of the pitiful macho image of the John Wayne — Frank Sinatra – Lee A. Iacocca — Bob Hope — George Wallace — J.R. — Ronald Reagan connection. It is the prescription to machoism in foreign policy and war. These old, insecure, white males' movies, dreams, music, and entertainment reflect and promote a narrow-minded, absolutist, and insane cultural impulse, which is the result of a struggle between us (the good guys), and them, the "evil" Communists.

The dreams of an America "who will not be pushed around," the dreams of an unrestrained American Planetary Empire seems to be troubled by the now recognized fact that there are more peoples and countries in the world than just the United States of America, which seems to sacrifice all, and take all into an apocalyptic Nuclear Hell, if the world's people do not submit to its pathological, imperialistic, male-dominated system of domination they peculiarly call "Democracy."

The dreams of a messianic American mission to destroy a so-called communist "conspiracy" has led us to major wars, (56,000 Americans killed in Vietnam, 46,000 in Korea, 300 in Lebanon, so far 11 in El Salvador), and untold misery and suffering in all those countries blessed by our generous invasions and bombings. Facing a world in a state of crisis, challenged by complex problems, Mr. Reagan's simple-minded jingoistic thinking ("Bomb them") goes against common sense and threathens domestic and international peace. But Abraham Lincoln, once said: "You can't fool all of the people all of the time." Mr. Reagan, you were right, so right: You ain't seen nothing yet.

The return of Prohibition?

William J. Spain

Dark days are upon us, my fellow citizens. The signs are all around. A policy that failed miserably before is now being revived. I fear that Prohibition is once again rearing its ugly head. Even in supposedly "liberal" states, elected officials are legislating morality with a zeal unseen since the time of temperance unions. If they keep it up, pretty soon all the bars will be padlocked and all there will be to do is go to church.

Take a look at what has been happening in the last few years. The drinking age, always decided by the states before, has now been decreed by the federal government. What is more, the feds are not above using extortion to make sure their will is carried out. This is not just a question of 'morality, it is a matter of state vs. federal lawmaking powers. Granted, making people wait a few more years to legally drink is not necessarily the first step towards totalitarianism. However, it does put in place a precedent that could be expanded into other areas traditionally dealt with by local residents.

If we are going to keep the drunks off the road, we are going to have to make them scared to get behind the wheel in the first place.

Another thing that rankles is the disappearance of beer from rock concerts and sporting events. Why? Is it because of the small number of people who can't handle it? Apparently, that is the case. So, the rest of us get screwed because of a few evolutionary throwbacks. I guess that is just the way we do things in a free society.

The latest move has been the banning of happy hours in our great Commonwealth. That one started in Springfield. Let me clue you in on one of their flawless reasons for doing so. You see, some drunken moron ran over a guy in the parking lot of the bar where he (the moron) had been getting plastered. It turned out that the place had been offering drink specials at the time. Of course it was the cheap booze at fault, not the driver. Yes folks, logical reasong is indeed "Making It in Massachusetts."

It is unfortunate that many people are covinced these stringent measures are nothing more than necessary steps in a war on drunk driving. I am painfully aware of the need to cut down on the carnage and am prepared to endorse almost any means to that end. The problem is that I have questions not only about the present method's fairness, but its effectiveness as well.

All the politicians point to the fact that there has been a decrease in alcohol-related teenage traffic deaths in the period since the drinking age went up. They are so busy patting themselves on the back that they have not stopped to consider that it might have come about because of increased awareness of the crisis. That, coupled with aggressive law enforcement efforts, has done a lot more good than any silly age restriction.

If we are going to keep the drunks off the road, we are going to have to make them scared to get behind the wheel in the first place. I suggest that an automatic loss of license for one year follow conviction on a first offense. Add a stiff fine, community service, alcohol education and court costs, and we will have a much better system. Too bad we have a legislature and a governor who believe in simple solutions to complex problems.

Letters to the Editor

Appreciating one's 'quaint' hometown

Poor Bob Kievra. In his Random Note (Collegian Nov. 27) he spoke of how isolated he felt from his hometown in Vermont because he'd changed while he was away at UMass. Now, his narrow-minded Vt. friends no longer accept him because he's college-educated and has an entirely new outlook on life.

Being a graduate student here at the University, and a native small-town Vermonter with a Vt. lineage that goes back to the origins of the state, I feel qualified to offer Bob advice that may help him, and others in his situation:

1) Don't forget that education is relative. Just because you went to school for four years doesn't qualify you to pass judgement on your friends' aspirations in life. If they awarded Master degrees and Ph.d's for carpentry, mechanical and farming know-how, a lot of my friends back home would be holding doctorates.

2)Just be yourself when you go home and don't try to talk above your friend's heads on a subject your certain they're unfamiliar with, so you will appear "smart." I don't mention anything about what I'm studying down here when I'm at home. If they ask me, I explain briefly, in plain English, and leave out the technical jargon I know they don't want to hear.

3)Don't live under the illusion that you have to go to college to "expand your mind, and conquer new horizons." When I was home over the holidays, one of my best friends had just had his first son. He was absolutely elated. You can believe that the promise of raising his son expands his mind, and represents a new horizon for him to conquer. He doesn't need Philosophy 101.

4)Finally Bob, try going home more often. You mentioned in your letter you went home for the first time in nearly a year. They probably question just how much of a friend you really are when you visit them only once a year. If you see them only rarely, and then ramble on about how great college is and how enlightened you are, of course they're going to ingnore you, especially Vermonters, whom it's safe to say have a low tolerance of change and bullshit. When you talk like this to your friends back home, you're implying they don't know anything because they didn't sign up for four (five??) years of drinking, partying, and occasional reading and studying, which is the curriculum for lots of us when we're undergrads. Hell, you don't have to leave Vt. to do that, Bob. Just ask your friends.

New Drawings & Sculpture
by Russell Jaques
Herter Gallery II

By MICHAEL PHILLIPS
Collegian Correspondent

The latest bimetal sculptures by Russell Jaques glitter around the inside of the Herter gallery. Jaques, who has achieved national recognition for his work which includes stage sets for the Boston Ballet and the National Ballet of Canada, works in a double media, bronze and stainless steel. From the striding Bocionical forms to the smaller rhythmically writhing pieces, Jaques maintains a strength of form consistent with his ideas of rhythmic and graceful motion. As the press release states "the artist's interest in dance is evident." One can see certain parallel with the concerns of some of the constructivists, and possible Brancussi.

Jaques' apparent experimentation with the use of the plinth reflects a similar concern of the Constructivists. There is a problem in tying these flashing forms down to earth and the gallery. They are heavy, yet their vitality seems to defy gravity.

Even so I question the necessity of the perspex plinth. The forms do not need the illusion of floating, and the fact that the plinth is an attempt at an illusion undermines the effect. It becomes a trick, not a very good one, and people don't like having their intelligence insulted. So too with the "Kirhoffer Vertical." One can't escape the image of a lamp stand. You can either admit the plinth or reject it. Anything lukewarm won't hold water.

Although they have an apparent transparency, the reflective nature of the metals shimmers the edge. The eye travels around the forms drawn by this lack of definition. Narcissus would have loved these pieces, although the distortion might have proved disturbing. There is nothing nicer than the intimacy achieved between the object and the viewer when the object reflects the viewer in its own form, as if capturing the mind as well as the body. The glitter principal is similar to Brancussi's bird, a fine stretched-out form, a gateway to the soul. Jaques' surface is greater and draws one into the motion of the form. It is the reflective property that gives rise to the paradox of still motion.

It is difficult to tell if the drawings were done before or after the pieces, not that it really matters as the study of one form leads to another. However, these drawings look contrived, maybe because of the gaudy frames (why does the frame convention persist when it really isn't necessary?). There is something too finished about them, that denies their claimed function. They certainly do not possess the vitality of the scultpures. Where the fluidity of the sculptures depends on a balance of form and material, the harnessing of the motion and the image, the drawings do not express the motion. They are too static, as if confined by the pencil marks.

All the same it was impressive show; maybe a little too precious, some pieces a little too pretty (someone mentioned "over grown jewelry"). You can't deny the perfection of some of the surfaces. I did see the join once or twice, and although it might seem irrelevant to pick such flies, the pieces when the strive for that sort of perfection set the precedent.

Renowned British playwright Arnold Wesker will appear at the Curtain Theatre of the Fine Arts Center on November 29 from 2:30 to 5:00 PM. Wesker will read from his most recent play, Annie Wobbler, which recently opened on London's West End. A discussion moderated by David Knauf of the UMass Theatre faculty will follow. The presentation is partially funded by the School of Humanities and Fine Arts of the University and is open to the public free of charge.

The Grecourt Review, a literary journal of Smith College published each spring on a non-profit basis, is now inviting submissions of poetry, fiction, photography and other artwork. The only requisite for submitting work is that the material be original and not already subject to any rights. Anyone may submit work to be considered anonymously by the staff. All typed submissions and artworks may be mailed to Noray Mulvaney, editor, Haven House, Smith College, Northampton MA 01063. Each submittor should include his or her name and return address; all work will be returned suvsequent to publication of the 1985 journal. The deadline for all submissions is March 5, 1985.

Auditions for the premiere of Columbus, a new play by Robert Kornhiser will be held Sunday, December 2, in the Hampden Theatre, Southwest, UMass and Monday, December 3 at the Northampton Center for the Arts, both from 7-10 pm. This play, based upon the journals of the great explorer, will be cast and directed by Richard Hardin, who holds numerous Off-Broadway and regional theatre credits. There are several male roles and one female indian non-speaking role. Performances are scheduled for February and March. For more information phone Eugene Warner of Jackie Hunt at 545-2803 between 10 am and 4 pm daily.

New metal music
Belfegore "a fiasco", Autograph "a rehash"

Autograph
RCA Records

By FIELDING REINBAUM
Collegian Correspondent

This self-titled debut release has virtually no redeeming qualities, and anyone foolish enough to spend his money on this fiasco deserves to listen to it. Contrary to vocalist Meikel Clauss's claims("We're super wild!"), Belfegore (whose name comes from a German horror series) drones mercilessly.

Nearly all of the album's nine songs sound the same: the deathmarch beat rarely varies, and the lyrics are literally indistinguishable. The band borrows from A Flock of Seagulls and AC/DC to create its unique sound, which can best be described as "surprisingly ineffective."

Over-producer Conny Plank should also be blamed, in no small way, for this sterile, bland experience.

Vocalist/leader Claus says the band formed because all three members were "looking for a totally new direction." Unless they keep looking, Belfegore will never be anything more than the answer to a trivia question

O, Los Angeles! City of Angels! Fame, fortune, Hollywood! A melting pot of culture and style!

Oh, Los Angeles. "An imperfect city in an imperfect world," the only city to declare smog a legal citizen, the home of countless waterproof heavy-metal bands. . .

Autograph is forged from the latter. The band and their debut release are nothing more than a rehash of shit-rock cliches. Their album cover is hardly original: the front sports a pseudo-sci-fi illustration and hip band logo; the back is adorned with pretty-boy photographs of all the band members. The contents are no better.

"Nighteen and Non-Stop," "Turn Up the Radio," and "My Girlfriend's Boyfriend Isn't me," some of the album's more horrendous cuts, serve as a perfect backdrop for the band's high school lyrics:

Day in, day out, all week long
Things go better with rock,
The only time I'll turn it down
Is when I'm sleepin' it off. . .

It gets worse. The band sings of Harlequin Romances, lonely nights by the phone, and the "Thrill of Love" in a sincere, heartfelt number which contains this lyric gem:

It's an ageless recipe,
Human equation A plus B . . .

Sign in Please is not a complete write-off. It will probably appease 'the real rockers," and will probably sell just enough so that the band can afford a follow-up. Thank you, Los Angeles.

Senior tri-captain Chris Clarke, one of New England's best butterflyers, will lead UMass this season. The Minutemen open Saturday with Lowell.

Minuteman swimmers aim for New England dominance

"most potential ever" for UM

By NANCY A. BUKAR
Collegian Staff

The Black Dot.

When a swimmer on the University of Massachusetts' men's swim team is guilty of a false start, he gets the Black Dot.

The other team members, armed with kickboards, form an aisle that the guilty party must run through, with predictable results.

The Black dot may just be a gimmick to motivate the swimmers but it demonstrates the enthusiasm the Minutemen have this season. Their goal, the New England title.

"In all my years here, this season has more potential than ever," Russ Yarworth, the coach for six years said. "My job is to let them know that they can do it. I want them to have that killer instinct and work towards the common goal of the New England Title."

Yarworth is confident and deservedly so. "We've got the three best butterflyers in New England: Mike Minutoli, (a tri-captain) Chris Clarke and Craig Fuller. We have such depth in the butterfly that it's going to be tough for other teams to compete," he said.

Fuller, a junior transfer student from the University of Iowa, "has the ability to win two or three events at the New Englands and Atlantic 10 championships," Yarworth said.

"I'd like to do my best and shave times and I'd like to qualify for at least three events in the New Englands and the Atlantic 10," Fuller said.

But Fuller is not alone in his expertise. Sophomore Mike Hoover, a sprint freestyle and breaststroker, is "looking real strong in the water." "He has the power and the talent and we're looking for him to put it all together," Rich Bishop, also a sophomore, had shoulder surgery in the off-season for a torn rotator cuff. "He's just starting to come around," Yarworth said.

Freshmen will contribute a great deal to the team also. Jim Flannery, recruited two years ago, has decided to take Yarworth up on the offer just this year. "He's looking real hot," Yarworth said. Tony Baker is "a really good breaststroker with some knee problems. If he can overcome them, he will be a contender for the New England titles," the coach said.

In addition to Clarke, tri-captains Bill Feeney and Paul McNeil add depth to the team. With McNeil standing close by, Yarworth joked, "We're looking for him to have the year that is expected of a tri-captain senior of his caliber. He's like an MX missile ready to explode."

Additional strength is gained from the team's divers, freshman Keith Pisani and junior Pat Mullen. "They're good divers. Mullen has come a long way since his freshman year. They're important to the meet," Yarworth said.

"We're aiming for first because of the talent that we have," Yarworth admitted. "We'll easily get top five but if you're in the top five you should be able to challenge the top position." "You've gotta work hard but you've gotta have fun."

The good and the bad-football'84

By PETER ABRAHAM
and GERRY deSIMAS
Collegian Staff

It began September 1 in Amherst and ended November 17 at the same location. It included trips to three states and countless hours in a Chevrolet Impala. From Ball State to New Hampshire, the 1984 University of Massachusetts football season.

The votes are in:

Best Play: Linebacker Dave Cavanaugh's one yard interception return for a touchdown against Boston University. It took all of 1.2 seconds and must have established some kind of record.

Best Quarterback: Rhode Island's Tom Ehrardt. This guy can toss with the best. Smooth, poised and efficient.

Best Running Back: Boston University's Paul Lewis. The compact senior can run the power game, or look sweet breaking the long run. Richmond's Greg Grooms and UNH's Andre Garron are close behind.

Best Quote: Both by UM coach Bob Stull. In Delaware the articulate Stull muttered "I have no more quotes" and after the Richmond game he was heard to utter, "We got our asses kicked."

Best Game: New Hampshire, 20-14 for the good guys. Everything was done well, defensively, offensively and by the coaches. Hardnosed football at its best.

Worst Game: At Maine, a 20-7 loss. A debacle, an embarassment a slap in the face to the program. Let's forget about it.

Best Band: UMass' no doubt about it.

Best Rendition of the "Star Spangled Banner" The radio crew from WMUA at Holy Cross. The Crusader Band wasn't loud enough so Wayne added a little impromptu sound effects. It went unappreciated by the winner of the next category:

Worse Sports Information Director: Gregg Burke, Holy Cross. Any guy who puts his name in with the Holy Cross logo is on a power trip. We waited 45 minutes for football stats, and he gave the "college" media one vote (between eight guys) for the game's MVP. A real winner.

Best Sports Information Director: UMass's own Howard Davis. He runs the best pressbox in New England. Quick stats, lots of pre-game notes, announces records over speakers and turns up the heat when its cold. Love him or hate him, but he's the best.

Best Press Box Food: UMass and BU. Davis features hot dogs, soda and coffee throughout the contest. BU's Ed Carpenter has a nice halftime sandwich (roast beef and cheese) with chips, soda and cookies.

Worst Halftime Food: Holy Cross. Mr. Burke has soggy sandwiches on a sesame sed roll, in a Burger King box he must have gotten for free by the gross. Low class eats.

Best pre-game activity: Running around the empty airport in Bangor Maine. There's nothing to do in Maine except...

Best Bar: The Bar Harbor Hilton's place: Cheap drafts, good football talk, right down the hall.

Best post-game activity: Holy Cross' party. Everyone in purple, but a definite good time.

Worst Quote: "Excuse me sir, where are the women in this hotel," by an unnamed WMUA sportscaster in Maine. There were none.

Weirdest Sign: "12 minute parking" in Delaware. Not 10, not 15, 12. Exactly. 12.

Best Fan Quote: "He missed the tag, he missed the tag," by a partisan alone in a section by himself at Holy Cross. One too many drafts or what pal?

Most Knowledgeable Crowd: Delaware. These folks have a tradition for winners and appreciate it.

Worst Crowd: UMass. Half the people are in the parking lots, the other half are waiting to see the band. Three guys remember Vic Fusia and keep telling stories about Greg Landry and the Redmen. A hurting bunch.

Best Bet: Bol in Springfield

He's 7-6 (that's right seven feet-six inches), he scored 22 points and had 20 rebound (none blocked shots) in his first college game and he's coming to the Pioneer Valley.

He's Mante Bol from the University of Bridgeport via Sudan. The tall African will face Springfield College tonight at 7:30 p.m. Follow the signs from Rt. 91 to see college hoop's latest sensation.

UAB climbs, Hoyas still tops in AP poll

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. (AP) - Coach Gene Bartow caught a cold in Alaska but the weather didn't bother his Alabama-Birmingham basketball team, which jumped into the Associated Press college rankings Tuesday after winning the Great Alaska Shootout.

The Blazers defeated Tenessee and two ranked teams, No. 2 Illinois and No. 19 Kansas, at Anchorage and were rewarded with the No. 13 spot in this week's poll.

The defending national champion, Georgetown, remained No. 1 with 55 of the 57 firstplace votes from a panel of sportswriters and broadcasters. DePaul moved from third to second, followed by St. John's

Georgetown opened its season in Hawaii with victories over Hawaii-Hilo and Hawaii-Loa and opens at home Saturday against Southern Connecticut.

DePaul won its first game under new Coach Joey Meyer, a one-point decision over Northern Illinois. DePaul got one of the first-place votes not given to Georgetown and got 941 points in the poll compared to Georgetown's 1,127

St. John's, its season not started yet, got 859 points and Duke, which got the other firstplace vote, was fourth with 838 points.

Memphis State got 775 points, followed by Louisville, which jumped to sixth from17th by defeating then-No.4 Indiana, Illinois, Washington, Southern Methodist and Oklahoma.

The Second Ten includes North Carolina State, Indiana, Alabama-Birmingham, Syracuse, Virginia Tech, Louisiana State, Arkansas, Georgia Tech, North Carolina and Nevada-Las Vegas and Kansas, tied for 20.

Senators grant exemption, approve attorney general

By BOB BURGESS
Collegian Staff

The Undergraduate Student Senate, meeting for the first time since Nov. 14, last night approved a new student attorney general, granted an exemption to Boltwood project members for missing their budget proposal deadline, and rejected a motion to list senate speakers on either an overhead projector or chalkboard.

Senators approved Pia Giamasi, who was recommended by the Student Government Association search committee, as new student attorney general Susan Gladwin. Gladwin is leaving the University of Massachusetts at the end of the semester.

According to a press release issued by the SGA President's Office, Giamasi was selected as a "result of a very broad and successful search," in which many "talented applicants were interviewed."

"Pia has worked in the Attorney General's office for the past six months, and commands a strong working knowledge of the University and student judicial systems," the report stated. She is a junior legal studies major and becomes the third attorney general this semester.

Gladwin updated the senate about what she has done since her appointment in September, which included work with the residential area head advocates on student notification of disciplinary pre-trial hearings, and drafting an updated Code of Student Conduct.

The SGA president's press release stated that Giamasi would continue working in these areas.

Giamasi was not able to attend last night's meeting, according to SGA co-president Rick Patrick.

In other business, senators agreed to permit Boltwood Project members to submit their 1985 budget proposal after the Nov. 19 deadline set by the SGA budgets committee. According to budget committee chairman Joseph Sparks, Boltwood Project supervisor Karen Brewer did not submit a budget until Nov. 21 because she had not been notified of the deadline.

The Boltwood Project is a student volunteer organization which works with patients at the Belchertown State School, a state run institution for the developmentally and physically disabled.

UMass student examining new solar heating method

By JIM AVERILL
Collegian Staff

The viability of a new type of solar heating system will be the subject of a study to be conducted by a mechanical engineering major this winter at the Solar Habitat at the University of Massachusetts.

The Solar Habitat is an alternative energy systems test facility at Orchard Hill.

Peter Skillman, a senior from Chestnut Hill, will evaluate the performance of a direct gain solar heating system installed yesterday compared to the method of gaining heat from water.

The direct gain method uses 4-by-2 foot heating panels 6 inches thick, with an aluminum frame surrounding an aluminum absorber. The panels are covered by a low-iron tempered glazing. The aluminum absorbs the sun's heat and the glazing prevents the heat from escaping the panels, which are embedded in the roof. Fans inside the building circulate the heat conducted via the panels throughout the building. Skillman's study will find out how the direct gain method compares to solar heating methods that rely on water as the primary conductor of heat.

The study will measure the efficiency of the system by recording all changes in temperature, both inside and outside the building, through the use of thermocouples, which are temperature sensors. The information will then be collated and analyzed by a computer.

All equipment being used in the research is being donated by Advanced Sun Technologies of Ludlow.

Skillman conceived of the study when he worked at Advanced Sun during this past summer. He said that more people are becoming interested in solar heat because tax credits for solar heat end on December 31, 1985. He decided to do the project so that homeowners could have unbiased test results on solar heating systems.

Data from the study will be available in the late spring.

According to Skillman solar energy is "absolutely crucial to future energy needs." He added that, as much as 20 percent of the world's energy needs may be provided by solar energy by the turn of the century.

Author opposes genetic engineering

Genetic engineering, natural resource and energy consumption, and economics will be the topics discussed by author and social theorist Jeremy Rifkin in his lecture, "The Age of Transition," tonight.

The lecture, sponsored by the Distinguished Visitors Program, will be at 8 p.m. in room 131 of Morrill Auditorium.

Rifkin, opponent of genetic engineering, obtained a California court order that blocked genetically altered bacteria from being released into the environment.

Rifkin, 39, has used congressional testimony, television appearances, speeches and lawsuits to discuss what he considers to be the dangers of genetic engineering.

Rifkin, who has no formal training in science, is concerned that the advancing field of biotechnology will unleash dangerous organisms into the environment.

Biotechnology is the science of modifying genetic material, the molecules on which all plant and animal life are based.

He also fears that altering human genes in an effort to cure disease will lead to alteration of the human species.

Rifkin is the author of several books including, Who Should Play God, Entropy: A New World View and Algeny. He has appeared on television programs such as "The Today Show," "Phil Donahue" and "Good Morning, America." -Tom Middleton

Ruckelshaus leaves EPA

William D. Ruckelshaus, administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, submitted his resignation Wednesday to President Reagan, who accepted it.

Ruckleshaus said he is returning to private life with "both regrets and a sense of accomplishment."

He said that during his term of office, the second time he has held the job, he has succeeded in restoring employee morale that had been shattered during the controversial direction of EPA by his predecessor, Anne Burford. "Employee morale and competence is high," Ruckelshaus told Reagan.

"First-rate presidential appointees are in place," said Ruckelshaus. "A management system has been installed that is functioning well and all of the programs have generated momentum.

"In short, the ship called EPA is righted and is now steering a steady course."

CIA worker targeted as spy

An investigation that led to the arrest of a former CIA employee accused of spying for the Czechoslovakian intelligence service took more than two years and included an interview in which he admitted spying, a federal prosecutor said in court Wednesday.

Karl F. Koecher, 50, gave the Czech intelligence agency "virtually any classified or other material, information, assessments and CIA personnel identifications" that he obtained, an FBI affidavit said.

Giuliani said Wednesday that after working as a translator for the agency in Washington from 1973 to 1975, Koecher became a "contract employee" for the CIA in New York from 1975 to 1977.

Koecher was arrested late Tuesday as he and his wife Hana were preparing to fly to Switzerland and begin a new life in Austria, the FBI said. They had sold their Manhattan home just hours before. Hana Koecher, 40, was held as a material witness and authorities refused to say whether she would be charged.

Koecher admitted his involvement with the Czech agency to FBI agents in an interview last Friday, but was not immediately arrested, the prosecutor said, because "the FBI believed it was in their interest to string this thing along to develop additional evidence."

US businessproductivitydown

U.S. business productivity dropped 0.7 percent in the third quarter of this year, breaking a two-year string of increases and reinforcing recent indications of a sharp national economic slowdown, the government reported Wednesday.

Economists inside and outside the government said the figure would almost certainly climb above zero again before long.

However, the analysts also said strong future gains in productivity depend heavily on increases in the money that businesses spend on new plants, machinery and technology development. And they said no spending burst seemed likely as long as the economy in general was growing as slowly as it is now.

Michael K. Evans, who heads an economic consulting company in Washington, said productivity gains since the end of the 1981-82 recession "have not been very good for the first phase" of recovery.

Tax plan aimed at cheaters

The Treasury Department claims its plan for revamping the federal tax system will do much to recover the $90.5 billion a year lost to cheaters, but the agency flatly rejects temporary amnesty as an incentive for delinquent taxpayers to settle their accounts.

Primarily, the report said, the department's proposal to restrict itemized deductions would cut the number of taxpayers who itemize and, in the process, the number who cheat on their deductions.

The IRS estimated that it loses $52.2 billion a year because people fail to report all their income from legal sources; failure to file any return costs $2.9 billion. Another $6.3 billion is lost to overstated business expenses and $6.6billion to exaggerated personal deductions, exemptions and adjustments.

Failure of employers and individuals to submit what is owed costs another $6.8 billion. Corporate cheating boosts the gap by $6.2 billion.

Dole elected majority leader

Sen. Robert Dole, wisecracking chairman of the powerful Senate Finance Committee and a likely 1988 presidential aspirant, defeated four rivals on Wednesday in the hotly contested battle to succeed Howard H. Baker Jr. as Senate majority leader.

The 61-year-old Kansas Republican was elected 28-25 over his closest competitor, Ted Stevens of Alaska, on the fourth secret ballot in a caucus of all 53 GOP senators who will serve in the upcoming 99th Congress.

Three other contenders - James McClure of Idaho, Pete V. Domenici of New Mexico and Richard Lugar of Indiana - were eliminated one by one in the first three rounds.

Both Baker and Dole are in the middle of the GOP political spectrum, suggesting that Dole's election will not result in an ideological shift in the chamber that Republicans regain from Democrats in 1980 and held onto in the elections earlier this month.

Artificial heart recipient William Schroeder is fed a milkshake for breakfast by his wife Margaret Schroeder in his room at the Humana Heart Institute.

Doctor "amazed" by progress of mechanical heart patient

LOUISVILLE, Ky. (AP) - An "alert and cooperative" William Schroeder sat up in bed Wednesday, joked with his nurses and ate his first solid food since receiving a mechanical heart - warm porridge fed to him by his wife.

Doctors said the 52-year-old retired quality assurance specialist continued making an excellent recovery. At midafternoon, they said, Schroeder sat up in bed with help from his doctors and briefly dangled his feet over the side of his hospital bed.

Dr. Robert R. Goodin, a cardiologist who cared for Schroeder before his operation, said he was "amazed that he has this kind of strength and progress" so soon after surgery.

Goodin said Schroeder's wife told him she felt her husband "was more comfortable today and in the past 24 hours than he had been for months prior to the surgery."

He said he expected Schroeder to be sitting in a chair by Thursday and - alluding to the patient's first request upon being able to speak - added: "He's still after his beer, which should come in 24 hours."

Dr. Allan M. Lansing, who assisted at Sunday's surgery, said Schroeder explained to his nurses how to make the ideal glass of lemonade and told them that "Ronald Reagan should be so lucky as to have to go through this," an apparent reference to the assassination attempt upon the president.

While Schroeder was being weighed, an uncomfortable process that required him to roll to one side in bed so that a scale could be slid beneath him, he said, "I'm going to remember the names of everybody here, starting with the big guy," meaning his surgeon, Dr. William C. DeVries, a former college basketball player.

Exhibitionist, burglar reported

An Amherst woman discovered a man masturbating outside her window at 1:05 a.m. Tuesday after lifting her window shades when she heard leaves rustling, Amherst Police said.

The man fled from the Crosby Avenue residence immediately. Police searched the area, but the man was not found.

A person wearing a ski mask was reported looking in the window of a North Prospect residence Monday at 9:02 p.m., police said. Police said the person fled the scene when lights were turned on.

A similar incident occured at 12:34 a.m. that night, when a Kendrick Place resident reported seeing a person wearing a ski mask in his yard, police said. The person fled when he was seen.

At 3 p.m. Monday, another North Prospect Street resident reported a stranger was in the house going through a purse. Police said he entered through an unlocked front door while the residents were at home, and fled when he was confronted.

A Community Service Officer observed a 19-year-old Wayland man rip the side-view mirror from a parked 1981 Honda Monday night, police said.

Abortion suits discussed by four lawyers

Four women lawyers will discuss the landmark 1973 abortion case of Roe vs. Wade at the Franklin Patterson Main Lecture Hall at Hampshire College at 7:30 tonight in a forum called, "Recollections and Regrounding."

Rhonda Copelon, Nancy Stearns, Nadine Taub, and Catherine Roraback have been involved in civil rights and women's rights cases since the early 1960's.

Roraback is the attorney who handled the Griswald case in which the Supreme Court legalized birth control.

All four attorneys worked on the earliest challenges to previous laws that outlawed abortion, and have helped to develop strategies in feminist legal theory. They plan to discuss the women's movement of the 1960's, and the challenges to today's abortion laws in the 1980's.

Dairy Mart founder lecturing tonight

The University of Massachusetts Investment Club will sponsor a free lecture by Charles Nirenberg, founder of the Dairy Mart chain of convenience stores, at 7 p.m., in Campus Center, room 163.

Nirenberg, 60, built his successful wholesale ice-cream business into the Dairy Mart chain. Founded in 1958, the chain now has 220 outlets, of which 60 are privately franchised.

With projected yearly revenues of about $80 million, the company has also bought two other similar chains, Sunnybrook Farms and Dutchland Farm. Investment Club chair Steven Kohl has described Nirenberg as "a successful, entrepreneurial multi-millionaire".

Publisher meets students, faculty

Discusses business, journalism

By LARRY BOUCHIE
Collegian Staff

The publisher of the weekly newsmagazine U.S. News and World Report used his recent two-day visit to the campus to emphasize the direct relationship between journalism and business in the field of publishing.

William G. Dunn, a University of Massachusetts alumnus, was here Tuesday and Wednesday to meet with students, faculty, and the deans from the schools of Journalism, Communication Studies, and Management.

Dunn was also a guest lecturer for a management course yesterday. He discussed the need for an understanding of business by people working for newspapers and magazines.

"I think the opportunities for MBA's (Master of Business Administration) in the publishing business and the communications business are very bright," Dunn said. "The business has evolved, there's great room for innovation...and the business is an attractive one."

Dunn said that people entering the publishing world should have some business experience before they do so.

"The guy who knows how to get things done will always have a job, and the guy who knows why will always be his boss," he said.

Asked whether the print media will still be strong in the future while visual media is gaining strength, Dunn said "I think it's going to be alive, well, and healthy."

Dunn noted that newspapers and magazines have already "weathered the storm" created by television in the 1950s and that the "threat" of cable television has faltered, to the point where there are more magazines than ever before in this country.

"If you fill a void, that's key," Dunn said. "If television could do it all, you simply wouldn't have all the forms of media you do today.

"One of the attractions to coming back to UMass (is to emphasize) the practicality of the communications business," he said.

"I always figured that when the time came for me to retire, I'd like to return to the Berkshires...and apply my pragmatic knowledge to academia somehow," Dunn said.

But Dunn explained he was unsure of what kind of contribution he could make to the University now, while he is busy with his work.

Dunn said he enjoyed the opportunity to revisit the campus, and to discuss the relationships between business and education, and business and publishing with students and educators..

UMass will aid African education

By TOM LUND
Collegian Correspondent

The Federal government's United States Information Agency has given a $247,380 grant to the University of Massachusetts' Center for International Education to improve secondary schools in the East African country of Tanzania.

The Peace Corps is also giving a $135,202 grant to the Center to train Peace Corps volunteers to teach in Tanzania.

The University's School of Education is working with the Dar Es Salaam College of National Education to improve Tanzanian schools and teacher education in math, science and English.

Tanzanians will come to the University to do research, while UMass professors will go to Tanzania. Richard D. Konicek, professor of education, will leave for Tanzania this January to set up teacher centers.

Dr. George E. Urch, professor of education, has been to Tanzania and says Tanzania's educational system has moved in recent years from a policy of self-reliance, whereby the country relied on its own resources, to a desire for involvement with the rest of the world. He said Tanzania hopes to improve its agriculture and build a small industrial base.

One of the purposes of the UMass-Tanzania exchange is to supply Africans with research done at UMass. UMass is the only school working with Tanzania to improve its schools. Urch said improving English language skills will help give Tanzania the "window to the world" that they desire.

Urch said that UMass was chosen after a search by Tanzanian educators last winter because UMass developed a good reputation with them.

Urch traveled to Tanzania last spring and observed colleges for teacher education and secondary schools. He developed the Teacher Text-Technology Initiative. This plan calls for the improvement of teacher education, textbooks, and classroom materials - and for the exploration of the feasibility of utilizing radio broadcasting to improve teacher and secondary education in English, math, and science.

The grant from the USIA will be used to create teacher centers, textbooks and educational materials, and explore how technology could be helpful.

The Peace Corps volunteers are being trained by University faculty and graduate students at a facility in Salisbury, Conn. They are studying teacher training theory and practice, subject upgrading, third world development, and cross-cultural communication. The 21 volunteers will teach mathematics, physics, chemistry, and engineering.

Illiterate grad reading now

(AP) When George Norton graduated from high school, he had never read a book. Teachers had just passed him on from one grade to the next.

Norton, 43, is a successful farmer in Blount County, Tenn., and also operates a construction company.

But less than two years ago, he was still functionally illiterate, as are an estimated 23 million adult Americans.

On a visit to a cousin in Oregon, however, he was persuaded to enroll at a learning center for a couple of hours a day. In seven weeks, he moved from the illiterate stage to a third grade reading level.

"Now I can figure things out for myself," Norton says. "I can sign my own business contracts, can read street signs and find my own way around when I drive my car."

Norton says he managed to live without reading by developing an extraordinary memory and by avoiding potentially embarrassing situations.

"You learn not to put yourself in positions where you can't read," he explains. "You continually wear a protective shield. When people call me on the phone, I can't write their names down, so I have to remember everything I hear."

Dukakis: drug abuse threatens high schools

BOSTON (AP) - More than 60 percent of Massachusetts students claim they have used drugs and 90 percent say they've used alcohol - a rate the governor called disturbing, according to a report published Wednesday.

The problem "threatens the fabric" of the state educational system, said Gov. Michael S. Dukakis, who will use the study to kick off a major campaign against teen-age drug and alcohol abuse.

Researchers, surveying students in 73 high schools throughout the state, found that drug and alcohol use was highest in southeastern and western Massachusetts and the North Shore and lowest in Boston.

The report said the picture that the figures paint may even be moderate, since many heavy abusers drop out of school.

More than 50 percent of students claimed to have used marijuana, 24 percent claimed they had used amphetamines, 19 percent said they had used inhalants and 17 percent said they had used cocaine.

Thirty-one percent of students told researchers they'd used one or more illicit drugs in the month before the survey.

Twenty-eight percent said they'd used illicit drugs at the age of 12 and younger.

Twenty-one percent of students had reported being high on marijuana while in school during the past year, and 9 percent on alcohol.

Fourteen said they had driven in the past year while high on drugs and 10 percent while high on alcohol.

OPINION

The opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the university unless otherwise noted.

The essence of education

The 16th century English educator Francis Bacon once said, "I would live to study, not study to live." In modern terms, a group of prominent educators recently reiterated this point that the main purpose of higher education should be to study for the sake of knowledge, and not just for the sake of making a living.

On Sunday, the group, headed by William J. Bennett, chairman of the National Endowment for the Humanities, charged in a report that in the past 20 years, more and more college students have graduated "lacking even the most rudimentary knowledge about the...foundations of their nation and civilization."

Administrators at the University of Massachusetts would do well to pay attention to the report. How many of us know of or are a student who has never read Shakespeare, studied the Civil War, or heard of Milton's Aereopagitica? How many have heard the remark, "Oh, that won't do me any good once I get out in the real world?"

The Bennett group's 46-page report found that from 1970 to 1982, the number of college students graduating with bachelors degrees in English dropped by 57 percent; in philosophy, by 41 percent; in history, by 62 percent; and in modern languages, by 50 percent. A more astounding statistic is that a student can get a bachelor's degree from 72 percent of all U.S. colleges without having studied American history or literature; from 75 percent without studying European history; and from 86 percent without studying about classical Greece or Rome.

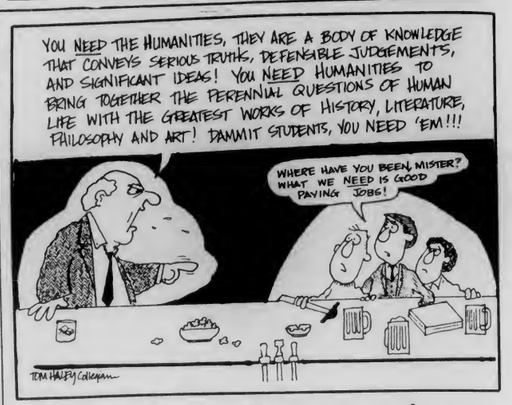
But as the report states, "The humanities are not an educational luxury...They are a body of knowledge and a means of inquiry that convey serious truths, defensible judgements, and significant ideas."

The report should be nothing new to Chancellor Joseph Duffey, himself a former chairman of the National Endowment for the Humanities. And yet Duffey has seemed to favor boosting the science and technology research coming out of UMass. Recently he has entertained leaders in the business world and has pushed for a proposed $20 million polymer research center. Both will be good for the University, and neither is surprising, since Duffey shares Gov. Michael Dukakis's belief that a primary role of the public higher education system is to produce skilled workers to build the strength of the state's high-tech industrial base.

While we agree this is an important purpose, we feel both men should heed Bennett's warning that too many college graduates "remain shortchanged in the humanities. (And) the fault lies principally with those of us whose business it is to educate these students."

Duffey must begin plans to ensure that the national trend away from the humanities does not reach the Amherst campus, and that we remain an institution where students learn about life, and not just about how to make a living.

Unsigned editorials reflect the majority opinion of the Collegian Board of Editors.



YOU NEED THE HUMANITIES, THEY ARE A BODY OF KNOWLEDGE THAT CONVEYS SERIOUS TRUTHS, DEFENSIBLE JUDGEMENTS, AND SIGNIFICANT IDEAS! YOU NEED HUMANITIES TO BRING TOGETHER THE PERENNIAL QUESTIONS OF HUMAN LIFE WITH THE GREATEST WORKS OF HISTORY, LITERATURE, PHILOSOPHY AND ART! DAMMIT STUDENTS, YOU NEED 'EM!!!
WHERE HAVE YOU BEEN, MISTER? WHAT WE NEED IS GOOD PAYING JOBS!

Pageant condones sexism

Rebecca Thatcher

My mother always tells me that at the University of Massachusetts we live in a haven of fairness, awareness and intellectual stimulation which is not to be found anywhere in the real world. Usually I agree with her. At UMass we have an administration that is at least superficially committed to fairness and we have institutions like the Office of Third World Affairs and the Everywoman's Center to go to to solve problems.

As the Collegian women's issues editor, I get a lot of mail every day. Today I was going through my mail and something caught my eye. After I threw out the eight by ten glossy photograph of a bowl of beans and the accompanying press release titled "Is it Chili or Chile" and sorted through various other announcements and notices, I gingerly picked up an envelope with the return address: "Miss Massachusetts-U.S.A. Pageant." It announced with unmitigated urgency, "FINAL DEADLINE SET FOR 1985 MISS MASSACHUSETTS-U.S.A. ENTRANTS."

Its next important point was that, "There is no performing 'talent' requirement. All judging is based on poise, personality and beauty of face and figure." I thought, "Wow, not unlike the rest of American society" and continued reading with interest.

It went on to say that applicants must be over 17 and under 25 (the age when women are most valued in our culture) and had to have lived in Massachusetts for at least six months. It noted that this stipulation included "college dorm students."

Then it said, "All girls interested..." and "the girl chosen will represent the Bay state in the prestigious MISS U.S.A. PAGEANT, nationally televised on CBS..." and listed all the wonderful things that could happen to an entrant.

I called the pageant office in Boston and asked, first of all, why the entrants in a contest for females between the age of 17 and 25 were called "girls."

The woman who answered the phone said, "I know this is a big concern with feminists." I agreed lamentively and repeated my question. She said that's the way it is in the beauty pageant business. "Women are always girls."

She then granted me the permission to change the wording in the announcement if I desired. I thanked her and hung up.

Much to everyone's disappointment, I am sure, I am not going to print the announcement. Beauty pageants are the epitome, not an aberration of, a society that is sexist and racist. This year the Miss America prize was awarded to a very light-skinned Black woman. The implicit message for millions of Americans was that this is the ideal Black woman, so light that she could pass as a white woman. It was a disgusting demonstration of American racism within the sexist institution of beauty pageants. The oppression of "black Black" women is real and not talked about very much.

Beauty pageants are the epitome, not an aberration of, a society that is sexist and racist.

It is institutions like beauty pageants and habits like calling women girls that perpetuate the oppression in our society on the very young.

Though talking about changing the beauty pageant business is certainly the grossest reformism, it is past time for people who are concerned with a fair society to take a stand against entities which trivialize and degregate womanhood. Contests which judge women as things and pit women against each other belong in history not in present-day Massachusetts.

Rebecca Thatcher is a Collegian staff member.

Random Notes

Keep computers in check

Inventors trying to make life easier, safer and more pleasant, sometimes unintentionally push mankind into troubles. They make us re-think our moral and ethical standards, forcing legislators to write new laws, and individuals to adopt new codes of conduct.

The automobile, considered essential today, has made lawbreakers out of half the nation. Some people drive too fast, some park where they shouldn't, some don't stop when they should. Some people don't know when a taillight or headlight is dead. Some people fail to have the car inspected or insured, or registered.

The telephone, also considered essential, gets people in trouble if they tap it, or use it to convey obscene messages or to threaten. We even have laws about that.

We invented fire alarm systems to speed the arrival of extinguishing equipment, and had to have laws to prevent their misuse.

Somebody invented a spray to ward off muggers, and we have laws limiting its use. Now we are in a new sea of troubles precipitated by a complicated device called the computer.

International Business Machines, maker of such machines, recently ran a two-page ad with the headline, "There are rules for driving computers, too." It stated, "Everyone who uses a computer has a responsibility for the security of information in that machine. No one who uses a computer has the right to violate anyone else's security."

Several years ago, the popular television program Hawaii Five-O ran an episode involving a criminal who operated a computer from the front seat of his car. He used the computer to transfer money from somebody's bank account into his own. He erased airline reservations placed by somebody and put his own name on that seat. As a viewer, I had no idea how he did all these things, but I did understand the result. So did Jack Lord in the capacity of McGarrett.

Sometime later, the movie War Games, in which a teenage computer whiz tapped his way into the Pentagon's computers. He thought he was playing a game involving the placement of make-believe submarines, bombers, and nuclear weapons, unaware that he was giving commands to the real thing. We were saved in the nick of time.

From time to time, we read about youngsters who fiddle around with computers and find themselves in possession of all kinds of government information, and also in all kinds of trouble with government officials and authorities.

We probably can't "un-invent" the computer, so it is good that we are teaching school children how to use them. The rationale for that is the same as the rationale for teaching someone to drive a car. Just as driver education includes an introduction to the moral and ethical responsibilities that go with driving, so will computer education teach the responsibilities involved with that.

When the atomic bomb blew up Hiroshima and Nagasaki, Senator Brian McMahon launched a campaign for morality in the use of such weapons. He died soon there after.

Will we all follow him before the world accepts such moralities and makes it law?

Steve Haselton is a UMass student.

a guide to Dining Out

When dining common specials and Swanson frozen dinners no longer suffice, it's time to dip into emergency funds and splurge on Dining out. The Valley offers a smorgasbord of fine dining, inexpensive eats, ethnic foods and fast food establishments, concentrated in the downtown Amherst and Northampton areas. A person's palate preference differs as greatly as the selection of restaurants in the area, so there's much to choose from.

In the morning, after a weekend of partying, studying or just conversing with friends, breakfast establishments in the area vary in selection, quality and price. The Dove's Nest In Sunderland offers friendly, quick service, fairly inexpensive breakfast combinations, all for about $3.00.

Rooster's, in North Amherst and James McManus's offer similar bargains along with Classe Cafe in Amherst. Daisy's, which is a little more on the dollar side, is well worth the homemade breads and muffins.

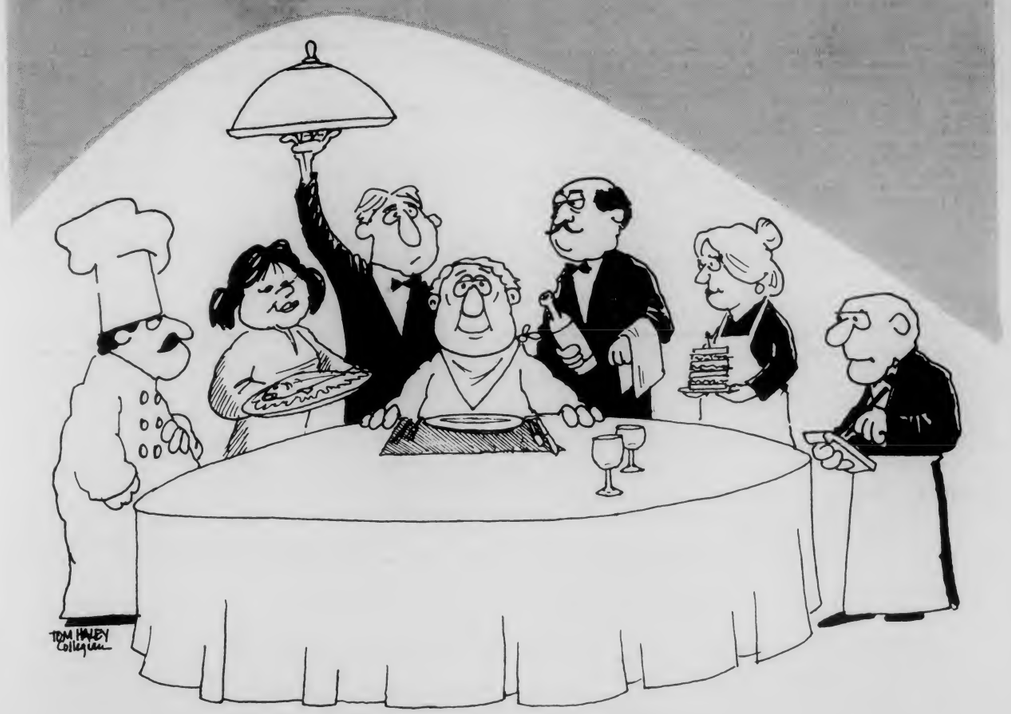
In the afternoon, when the peanut butter and jelly sandwiches begin to taste bland and unappetizing, head for Amherst Deli in the Carriage shops for some of the best sandwiches, potato salad and knishes around. Most restaurants offer its patrons luncheon specials so don't hesitate to try Amherst Chinese Food, Judies, The Pub or Carbur's on route 9.

When the sun sets and the suit and tie or dress adorned, it's time to get a taste of some of the best eats in the area.

Depending on the pocket book, the area offers average dinner prices from 5 dollars per person up to $15.00 a person. In Sunderland, Goten offers Japanese cuisine, and at a more expensive price, Beardley's and Lord Jeffrey Inn supplies continental and French cooking while Delano's and even Bonanza offers the great American delights, such as hamburgers and fries.

Whatever a patron's selection may be, the palate is your best critic. Inside you'll find some reviews of restaurants, raving and not so raving but some insight of what the Valley has to offer.

No one should ever be subjected to cans of Noodleroni or the D.C.'s "mystery meat" seven days a week. That's just not DINING OUT.



The Valley's best for your gastronomic interests

Editor's Note: Everyone's entitled to an opinion, so we as editors and staff members of the Dining Out special took liberties and tasted and sampled the areas best and not so best. You, as readers, have the right to disagree but if you find yourself being offended, write a letter to the Ed/OP editor. She loves mail.

Best place for pizza: Joe's in Northampton. The "in" place for future yuppies. The atmosphere is "tres" sports, a little dark with a bit of ambiance. Besides that, the pizza's tops and cheap at that.

Best restaurant to bring parents: The most expensive joint in the area. We recommend Beardsley's and Wiggins Tavern both in Northampton, Lord Jeffrey's Inn, and Plumbley's. Take advantage of it, you probably wouldn't be able to afford it alone.

Best West Indian: Yvonne's Place in New Africa House right on the UMass campus. Daily menu varies but you're sure to find honest, tasty, often spicy homemade cooking.

Best Italian: We've been told Hot Tomato in Northampton but personally haven't had the pleasure. What we do know is not to try Aqua Vitae—enter at your own risk.

Best Chinese/Mandarin: Sze's in Northampton—this stuff is "authentic." You'll be able to find vegetarian as well as tofu dishes, hot and sour soup, great peking raviolis, all minus the monosodium glutamate. It's not the Chinese-American crap you usually find and we won't say where at the risk of being slanderous.

Best Mexican: Raves and rants about La Cazuela in Northampton (are all the bestplaces way out of there?) Roll out the Rolaids at Taco Villa.

Best Hamburger place: Tillson Farm.

Best Coffee: Bonducci's in Amherst Center; The world's best artists, philosophers, commies, and writers will evolve from here. Great cappucino and some palatable desserts. Some survivors of Hatch brew say this place is tops.

Best Menu Selection: Carburs, Route 9, Hadley: Upstairs you'll find the largest menu selection since Friday's in Boston. Often, patrons leave because they can't make a decision. Great sandwiches if you can decide on one.

Best Barbeque: It all seems the same until the palate gets a taste of Bub's Barbeque at Bubs Barbeque in Sunderland. It's worth the trip when Bub himself will supply you with the best barbeque in the area and all the fixings.

Best dining atmosphere: Delano's in Amherst Center. The menu itself has a lot to be desired but the atmosphere makes up for it. Make sure you get a good seat, one that faces the door or by the window. You're sure to bump into everyone you've ever seen or met since starting at UMass.

Best hor d'oeuvres: Mike's Westview Cafe, North Amherst on Fridays only.

What more could you ask for? They've got food for a buck, all you can eat, atmosphere, grease, jocks playing pool and liquor.

Have a date and low on cash? Great places to eat for a lot less

By BRADFORD VERTER
Collegian Staff

So there you are. That person of your dreams has finally accepted your dinner invitation. But wait a minute—you squandered your last paycheck on that five record set of Don Ho's greatest hits. You have, let's see, one, two, three,...nine dollars and 78 cents left. How are you going to impress your date?

Well, there are a number of cheap eateries where you could take your date. There are the usual fast food chains: McDonald's and Burger King on Route 9, Friendly's and Wendy's in Northampton. The chains are so designated because the food leaves one's system as swiftly as the food enters it.

If you've tired of the traditional fare, however, you may sample one of the many, varied local restaurants. With the winter's chilly winds breathing down your neck, you may want to warm up with a bowl of soup at Northampton's Soup Kitchen. Featuring three different soups daily, the Soup Kitchen also offers homemade salads and desserts, all under $3.

If you are afflicted with dining commons's nostalgia, and long for those fine greasy foods, The Gas Light on Main Street, Amherst, offers a well-lubricated variety. If you want to commute for your cholesterol, the Red Lion Diner on Pearl Street in Northampton is open 24 hours. While the food is uniformly cheap, they sport a sign warning "Prices subject to change according to customers attitude."

If your date's tastes lie south of the border, you may want to go to Taco Villa in either Amherst or Northampton, which feature solid sources of Montezuma's Revenge. Finer stuff is available at La Cazuela on 7 Old South St. in Northampton where dinner averages $3 to $8 per person, and is graced with fresh chips and imported spices.

T.J.'s Food and Spirits on Bridge Street in Northampton is for the sports fan on a budget. You can look at the pictures of athletic personalities on the wall while you enjoy the inexpensive burgers and sandwiches.

The Paradise Deli on 235 Main St. offers to cater your dinner to your budget. The only local place for quality knishes, the Paradise offers (at $1.89 a pound) their famous Wolf Hash, which is possibly unique in epicurian history.

Dimly lit and boisterous, Joe's Cafe on 33 Market St. is popular for its pizza and full bar. "It's Heaven," claims English major Chris Marini, "absolutely Heaven."

Packard's on Masonic Street offers a twofer dinner for $12.95, while Hunan Gardens on Belchertown Road sports a nightly buffet for $5.25.

And if you're successful in impressing your date, you can go to Myer's Eatery on 86 Pleasant Street for a breakfast under $3 a piece.

On Campus Eateries

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

You're on campus, it's cold, you have to study and you're hungry. Karl Malden walks by and asks, "What will you do?"

Plenty. The University of Massachusetts offers a variety of food, all within a short distance from any spot on campus.

The Campus Center features the Blue Wall Cafeteria during the day. There's more than beer and comedy at the Wall, hot entrees, soup, salad bars and deli sandwiches are on the menu here, for a reasonable price. Stuffed cabbage is their hot seller.

A "Quickie Lunch" is available on the tenth floor of the Campus Center and once again soups, salads and sandwiches, with a view, is the fare.

If you just picked up that refund check, or you're looking to impress that certain someone you know, the "Top of the Campus restaurant is a good idea.

Lunch ranges from $3.50 to $7 and the TOC offers a meal ticket exchange plan (give them a call for info) and students get a 15 percent discount.

*The Hatch*and the Coffee Shop offer fast food at decent prices. Breakfast, lunch and dinner. Pizza, burgers, deli sandwiches, fries, bagels, pasta, salads and drinks are available.

Quick food on the run, a bit too greasy perhaps, but you gotta love it.

Waiting to turn in that form in triplicate at Whitmore? Try the snack bar downstairs. Fries, shakes, croissants, pita sandwiches, diet plates and raw vegetables along with popsicles, candy, coffee and soda are available here as well as at the Hampden and Worcester dining commons snack bars.

Still want more? Try the Kennedy Snack Bar in Southwest on the fifth floor. Ice cream, sandwiches, soups and candy at good prices. Field and Greenough also have dormitory snack bars run by students.

The final option? Drop some funds and hit the infamous dining commons. A little on the expensive side maybe, but you can eat all you want and see what college life is all about. Stay away from the things you read on the menu and don't know what they are, like the Diplomat Sandwich. The beefsteak special and the chicken pucks, are worth paying the price. The ice cream is good too and toppings abound.

Avoid Friday night dinners like a quantum physics course, they're both terrible.

If you have to hang out on campus the options are there, it's just a matter of knowing where to put your money to its best use.

Everything you want to know about wines

By MICHELLE HYDE
Collegian Staff

If you have ever gone into a fairly swank restaurant and been intimidated by the pomp and circumstance that surrounds wine serving and overpriced wine lists, or you're tired of having purple teeth from drinking cheap lambrusco, take heart.

Taking the plunge from the world of Ripple and Riunite to that of Liegkqmilch and Beaujolais does not have to be traumatic or expensive. You don't have to know about bouquets or smelling corks and you'll only have to spend between $2.99 to $5.99 for a decent bottle of wine, area wine sellers said.

Some people are "wine snobs," according to professor Robert Lewis who teaches a course on wines through the Hotel, Restaurant and Travel Administration Department at UMass. "They know what they're doing but they make such a production out of it its ridiculous."

Whatever the formalities surrounding it, wine is basically the product of the grape and the airborne yeast that turns the sugar of the grape juice into alcohol. The color of wine comes not from the color of the grape but from the length of time the skin remains with the juice.

Dry wine is the opposite of sweet wine and table wines are dry in varying degrees. It has more to do with taste than with quality. What people refer to as the body of wine is its substance- a full-bodied wine gives the impression of the lightness and afterglow we associate with alcohol, while other wines can be more lightbodied and more "delicate."

How to eat well on a budget

By IAN POLUMBAUM
Collegian Staff

Many of you undoubtedly have been reading the other articles in this dining special and wondering where you could possibly come up with the finances, time or companionship to go for a decent meal on the town.

But don't despair. If you're willing to give up luxuries you're accustomed to at mom and dad's table, like highly diverse entrees with mostly natural ingredients, you can cook for yourself while spending a minimum of money, minutes, muscle power and mental energy.

There are numerous products which are easy to prepare, provide more than the necessary daily intake of starch, salt and multi-syllable chemicals, and - best of all - are cheap.

Oodles of Noodles are arguably the creme of the lot. They come in several flavors, easily distinguished by the color of the wrapper. Just dump the flavor packet and the noodles in a pot of water - no need to boil first! - crank it up to high, and less than five minutes later you're munching on an (almost) Oriental delicacy.

These noodles are a long-term food planner's dream. At 1" x 4" x 5", three ounces, and at most 35 cents each, a three- to four-week supply (50 packets) fits in a shopping bag, weighs barely over nine pounds, and costs about 18 bucks.

More obscure brands of "ramen" noodles cost as little as 19 cents apiece at most supermarkets. Nearly all give you more than the U.S. Recommended Daily Allowance of: sodium carbonate, potassium carbonate, sodium tripolyphosphate, sodium alginate, disodium phosphate, tocopherols, monosodium glutamate (watch out for "Chinese restaurant syndrome," though), disodium inosinate, and disodium guanylate. What's more, the noodles are usually made with vitamin-enriched flour.

For a less exotic gastronomic experience, try one of the many macaroni and cheese dinners on the market. Kraft is the best known, but also the most expensive - up to 69 cents at convenience stores - due to the dependable brand name and the rich, deep Yellow #5 that's lacking in other kinds. Generic and house brands will set you back as little as a dollar for four boxes. Of course, here you'll have to add milk and butter for full appreciation of your dinner, but water will suffice in a pinch.

Beyond these basic reliables, use your imagination. Keep your eyes peeled for special markdowns-instant oatmeal, bread that's past the "sell before" date (frequently offered at Cumberland Farms), complete meals-in-a-pouch (affectionately known as "gag bags"), and anything else that's quick, easy and uncluttered by costly organic ingredients.

And if you're in the mood to splurge, call out for a pizza. Burrp.

The many facets of pizza in Amherst

Our author runs the gamut for area's most popular food form

By DAVID MUNIZ
Collegian Staff

The Amherst area is brimming with pizza places trying to take advantage of the student population that thrives on the saucy, cheesy things. The area's telephone directory lists 13 different establishments in Amherst alone that cater to the pizza eating crowd.

Of those 13, the Collegian took a random selection of five, and solicited questions about delivery, price, size, and the biggest sellers.

At Andy's pizza, located on University Drive, the Collegian spoke to Vicky Famiotis, wife of Andy Famiotis, who the restaurant is named after. Andy's is open until 2 a.m. "We sell a lot of pepperoni and mushroom pizzas, mostly to UMass. Plain pizza is still the biggest seller," she said. When Mrs. Famiotis was asked what she thought made her pizzas special, she said, "My husband makes the dough and the sauce fresh every day." She added proudly, "That's why we're the best."

Whether or not Andy's makes the best pizzas, is up to Andy's patrons who pay $6.10 for a large plain cheese pizza, and $3.15 for a small cheese pizza. Large 2-way combination pizzas cost $8.10, and a three-way for for $9.10. Andy's special with "everything on it" goes for $11.95. Of the five places the Collegian solicited, Andy's is not the most expensive, nor the least.

Bruno's Pizza, a relative new comer to the wild pizza world of Amherst is open until 2 a.m. on weekdays, and until 3 a.m. on weekends.

Bruno's is located at the old Whole Wheat Pizza Factory on Belchertown Road that went out of business last semester. At Bruno's, owner Bruno Matavazzo says the biggest sellers are the pepperoni and mushroom pizzas. "The Canadian bacon and cheese also sell well," he added.

Bruno's, which offers small, medium and large pizzas, also sells the cheapest pies of the five places queried. A large cheese pizza costs $5.75. A small pizza $3.00, and their new medium size pizza, just being introduced this week costs $3.75. Each item on a Bruno's pizza costs an additional 75 cents.

Owner of Campus Pizza, Mike Kulzer said, "We won't deliver, we rely on our name and reputation to make business." It has been in business for fourteen years.

"It's hard to say what our biggest seller is. On any given day it could be something different. They're all good," Kulzer said. If price is any indication of quality, then Campus Pizza should be very good. A large cheese pizza at Campus costs $6.95, the most expensive large cheese pizza of all five. Combination pizzas cost $7.60 for a large combo, and $4.60 for a small one. Campus Pizza is located on Route 9, about a mile away from the malls.

At Superior Pizza, we spoke to John Collyer, a worker. Superior is open until 2:30 a.m., except for Sunday nights, when it closes at 1:30 a.m. "Our biggest seller is probably the pepperoni and mushroom pizzas. Eighty to 90 percent of our business is from UMass." At Superior, a large cheese pizza costs $6.35, and a small one costs $3.35. A small combination pizza costs $4.05, and a large combo costs $7.55. "A small pepper and onion pizza costs $3.85," he added heartily.

Pinocchio's delivers on weeknights until 1 a.m., and on weekends until 2 a.m., co-owner Mauro Aniello said. "Both subs and pizzas are still our biggest sellers. Last September, we increased our menu to include everything from antipasto to dessert. We also established a full bar.

"People who come here can expect the same kind of cooking as in the North End of Boston." When asked what kind of cooking is in Boston's North End, he replied, "100 percent authentic Italian cuisine."

Whether or not the cuisine is authentic or not should be left for diners to decide. At Pinocchio's a large cheese pizza costs $6.00, and a small cheese pizza costs $3.95. Each additional item costs a dollar extra.

Depending on what consumers desire in their pizza, the Amherst area seems to have it all. The key word is variety in Amherst, as well as competition.

Food for drunks with little cash

By MARY CRESSE
Collegian Staff

If it's 3 a.m. and Domino's is closed and you're not in the mood for pizza anyway and all you have in the refrigerator is a half jar of mayonnaise, flat Sprite, the two ends of a loaf of wheat bread and your roommate's edge of rotten Muenster cheese, what do you do, huh? What do you do in a town with nothing open past ten except Jake's in Northampton, and that's Northampton, so that's out, and you'd prostrate yourself for a bag of Fritos?

Since none of the merchants in town has realized the gold mine in an all-night deli, you scrounge. It's before 3 a.m. or nothing.

But the Collegian understands. Or tries to. So they've sent out someone (no expenses paid) to check out the options. Herewith,

The Collegian First Annual Desperado Munchy Tour, 1984:

Don't get psyched. There are only four places worth trying: The Sub, JB's Roast Beef, James H. McManus and Jake's.

JB's: Setting up in a former hardware store, JB's has evidently ripped out the shelves and storage spaces and created a spacious, dimly lit pleasant place that's even clean (and anyone working in a fast food place knows how tough that is). Brick walls and funky decor they have; good subs they have not.

Or at least that has to be proven. JB's is only a month old, mind you; their specialty is roast beef, and like most places trying to establish a clientele (after that, it's permissible to go downhill— this is America, you know), the meat is good. The roast beef should be rare, and it is. But it's served on an air-filled Wonder bun the size of a yoyo.

What good are fresh veggies and meat if the tomatoes slip through your fingers? Especially if you're sitting in JB's window, drunk as a skunk after a night downtown, and you don't want the police in the station across the street to see you furtively grasping for lettuce on Formica...The price, Coke and all, comes to under $3. Not a bad option.

On to The SUB. The Sub's two main drawbacks are its merciless fluorescent brightness and post-midnight painter's cap crowd tht doesn't realize cruising should stop at the bars.

But who cares about ambience when the food is good? Okay, standard. We're in western Massachusetts. (Okay, then, good.)

But you get a good long bun and normal white American cheese instead of the ubiquitous yellow Hojo's (gag, gag) slices. The salads are a little pasty sometimes, but the meat subs (do not include steak) are usually good and the vegetables are fresh. This is one place where the Coke machines work, too. Prices could be lower (price for the half subs range from $1.79 to $2.99 roughly) but if you look over the counter and flirt with the help, (they're great, by the way) they're usually bigger. Avoid chili, though. It's slimy.

MCMANUS: McManus used to be the campus joke, and among those who haven't gone back after its renovation, still is—"Did you go to McManus or are you just hungover?" They've cleaned up their act—a good feed is the country breakfast—eggs, sausage, pancakes for under $3. The juice is still gross, but the fries came aplenty and hot. Give it another chance, gang, but be careful.

JAKES: Jake's is the place where Smithies take their dates after they—well, you know—or at least try to, and on any given Friday you can find per capita the largest number of oddly-stylish future females of this country wolfing down a waffle or Jake's good coffee. Jake's is expensive, and is Northampton, but it's always warm in there, and if you don't like the crowd, you've got the best no-cover show in town. Open 24 hours twice a week; if you want the closest thing to normal food— the eggs are real good—go here. But bring a fat wallet and some attitude.

★Best of

Best Variety in Ice Cream: Steve's Ice Cream in Northampton, Thornes Marketplace. Some basic and not so basic daily flavors with all natural ingredients that can be "mooshed in" (looks gross but yummy) with anything and everything from chocolate chips, heath bars, reese's cups to chocolate covered raisins and coconut. Call for the price; it's usually high.

Best Quick Lunch: The Blue Wall—the service is great and daily menu varies. Please, by all means, skip the Hatch.

Best Dessert: Judie's in Amherst Center. A woman who owns a chain of slinky lingerie and elegant perfume stores supplies the Valley with some of the riches and often exotic tasting desserts. Not only do they have an array of torts and creamy, rich chocolate cakes but the ice cream and liquer drinks are unbelievable...watch for the frangelico and eggnog special topped with nutmeg for the holidays. Leave the calorie counter at home.

Best After hours pigout: 7-11, Grampies, anything tastes good when you're in this state of mind. Eat something light, you'll probably lose it.

Best Earthy-Crunchy Haven: Paul and Elizabeth's In Northampton: great rice and cheese omelette dishes but don't dare to ask for soda, sugar, an ash tray or anything artificial. Try the fish, usually fresh and the homemade breads. It's all au natural here.

Best Relaxing Lunch— Daisy's North Amherst—all the breads are homemade, the service is superb and there are some of the best daily specials in the comforts of someone else's home.

Best Place to Bring a dinner date: Top of the Campus for the view but not for the food.

Best breakfast cheap: Dove's Nest, Sunderland...great stuff, and really cheap. Try roosters only if you're looking closer to campus, especially if you want to see who took who home the night before.

Best "All you can eat" Brunch: Plumbley's is passe but Fitzwilly's in Northampton can give you a wide variety of eats for $10 per person. Bird-like eaters need not indulge...everything is just too good.

Why flounder around when you could have Michaels' ?

By ANDY HELLER
Collegian Staff

When the pizza delivery person can find your room while blindfolded, and the golden arches have become a second home, it's time to enjoy some fresh seafood from Michaels' Market located on Main Street in Amherst.

Michaels' opened two years ago selling only fish, beer and wine, according to manager Anne Guiney.

"Now we're the only fresh fish market in Amherst," Guiney said.

Michaels' fish is delivered daily from Boston, New York or Rhode Island. Among the take out items sampled were the lobster roll and the seafood chowder.

The lobster roll, filled with a quarter pound of lobster meat, mayonnaise and lettuce on a Portugese roll was truly a seafood lover's delight.

"At $3.99, the lobster roll is one of our biggest sellers," Guiney said.

The seafood chowder at $2.99 per pint was a meal in itself. It contains cod, shrimp, scallops, carrots, potatoes and onions in a cream base.

"We make the chowder in the morning and it can vary occasionally depending upon what kind of fish is available," Guiney said.

The fish and chips special was not sampled, but at $3.99 for a half pound of cod and fries, temptation was almost unbearable.

In addition to the take-out items, Michaels carries a complete line of fresh seafood that you can prepare at home. Cod is the most popular choice with haddock coming in a close second.

"Pollock is very similar to the haddock but people are very reluctant to try it," Guiney said.

Michaels' always carries a supply of salmon, swordfish and bluefish but for those with a little richer taste, perhaps a live lobster from Michaels' tank at $4.99 per pound would satisfy your seafood craving.

Michaels' also carries cooked shrimp at $16.00 per pound and people do buy it because they know it's fresh.

To help those who never know exactly what to do with fresh fish, Michaels' has a number of fish cookbooks on hand for browsing or sale.

You can find everything from appetizers to Ben and Jerry's or Haagen Daaz ice cream for dessert.

Michaels' Market carries just about anything you can think of but the best thing you'll find is the personalized service. "We care about our customers and they'll keep coming back because they know our fish is always fresh," Guiney said.

Michaels' Market, at 437 Main Street in Amherst, is open Monday to Wednesday 9 a.m. - 8 p.m. and Thursday to Saturday 9 a.m. to 9 p.m.

best places for dress, impress , fine dining and debt

By NANCY A. BUKAR

You're out to impress that "special person" with a fine meal; you want to wine and dine them, charm them with your knowledge of the finest eateries in the Amherst and Northampton area. What to do? Read on...

The cream of the crop is the Lord Jeffrey Inn, located off the Common in Amherst center. It has the atmosphere of an old, traditional inn with continental dining. The atmosphere is quiet and subdued with an Old World decor. The wine list is extensive but, according to one local wine merchant, "you'll pay twice as much money. It's a nice wine list but it's way overpriced." Expect to spend about $60 for dinner for two with wine.

Beardsley's, next to Thorne's Marketplace on Main Street in Northampton, serves fine French food in an elegant setting. One person who ate there recently called it "romantic." They have a full wine list that is reasonably priced. Portions are small but very good. Dinner for two is in the $50-$70 range, depending on whether drinks or wine are accompanied with the meal.

Patrons get a taste of Plumbley's cuisine in its patio dining room.

In the heart of Amherst center, you'll find Judie's, serving a combination of French and continental cuisine. Judie Terespulsky, owner and head chef, combines French and American recipes for some interesting and sometimes unusual results. The desserts are quite good and change daily. The menu also changes about three times a year but the classic popovers are always available. Of their wines, a local wine merchant said, "They have a decent, drinkable wine for a good price, especially those from Argentina and California." Prices run between $35 and $45 for two depending on the wine.

There's a beautiful old house off the Common in Amherst that was converted into a restaurant called Plumbley's. Serving American food with an attempt at flair, the decor of Plumbley's is more impressive that its food. The prices on their wine list are moderate and dinner for two runs between $45 and $50. Don't order the baked stuffed shrimp.

On Route 9 in Hadley, you'll find Carbur's, a continental restaurant with a simple style. (We're talking about the downstairs restaurant). The food is varied with many types offered. One staff member here called it "gimmicky but it has a variety of foods. It's a good place to go out and have a good time and a decent meal. The atmosphere is superior to the food." The prices are moderate, ranging from $35 to $40. They do have a wine list and the prices are fairly low.

Now, pick one and charm somebody with your culinary knowledge. And don't forget your wallet.

Homemade meals that are ethnically diverse

From the kitchen that caters to West Indian and other cultural tastes, a woman yells, "What do you want, sweetheart? We got some nice curry chicken today, lamb if you want. You want bread, Caribbean ice tea, okay?" She holds a friendly repertoire with the patrons who can be characterized more as friends than customers.

Yvonne John, 40, a native of Guyana and a single parent who supports six children while earning a doctorate in multicultural studies at UMass, is the force behind Yvonne's Place, located in the basement of New Africa House.

When John came to the United States nine years ago, she was already predisposed to the culinary arts. Her West African grandmother taught her how to shake the spices, toss the foods and then coordinate it all to make it "right" when she was a young girl.

What, you may ask, is West Indian and other cultural specialties?

To John, whose father is Chinese and mother is of African descent, cooking for the University's faculty and staff is "multicultural."

John says her cooking is based on her background. Yvonne's Place offers a variety of foods which are seasoned by Amerindian, African, Chinese, Portuguese, Indian, Dutch, British, Moslem and Hindu influences.

On yesterday's daily menu, with items that are all fresh and homemade, Yvonne's Place offered Island Chicken Curry, Island Lamb curry, fried chicken, creole fried fish, and curried beef, all served with freshly baked date and fruit bread, three varieties of rice including a coconut milk based one, Caribbean ice tea sweetened with honey and lemon, fruit punch and dessert all ranging from $2.00 to $3.50.

Yvonne's Place is opened throughout the week from noon to six p.m. and is a student-run business. John, who does most of the shopping (students from Brett and Wheeler dormitory often help her carry in bags of groceries), plans and cooks the meals and receives kitchen help from students in exchange for meals.

John, who attended Trade Technical College for Culinary Arts in Los Angeles will be leaving UMass next year after she completes her degree. John, who has written a cookbook titled "Guyanese Seed of Soul: How to Prepare West Indian Food," is currently working on her second cookbook and intends to eventually open her own restaurant.

"Success is not money," she said. "Contentment is."

★ Wines

Most people agree that red wines are served with beef and game, white wines with veal, lamb, pork, fish and poultry. Rose wines generally don't compare with reds or whites as dinner companions, but can bring together the flavors of a cold buffet or picnic. For desserts, a sweeter wine is appropriate.

A lot of the wines that are served with meals tend to be drier than what the wine newcomer is used to. Dave Lamb, the owner of Four Seasons Liquor Store in Hadley, said. Lamb, who teaches a course in wine through the Office of Continuing Education, described wine as "the natural transition with meals. It makes food taste better and keeps the mouth refreshed."

Lamb said people willing to spend about $3.99 for wine can do a great deal of exploring the wines of Italy, Portugal, France and Germany, without skimping on quality.

His suggestions for people with "academically oriented pocketbooks" include Kellergeister, a semi-sweet, German wine which sells for about $3.50 a bottle, Spanna, a "nice, red full bodied" Italian wine which sells for about $3.00 a bottle, Beaujolais Nouveau, the "new chic French wine which is really fresh, and fruity and a great step up from Riunite," for about $4.00 a bottle, and Chenin Blanc, a California wine that is "between dry and sweet, great for sipping or with a number of foods," for about $3.00 a bottle.

Apathy in a time of need

Marc D. Paraison

Just another Thursday night, anxiously awaiting Friday and the end of the week. I sat staring at several assignments, not knowing where to begin. A nap is always a good place, I'll get up after a short one and be fresh for a night of studying.

After an hour, the digital alarm's piercing beep awakened me with a start. I quickly shut it off and stumbled to the bathroom. Standing at the urinal I began to feel extremely dizzy. I tried to stumble to a stall to sit and regain my composure, but the next thing I knew I was lifting my head off the floor, blood dripping from my lip. As I was becoming conscious, a fellow floormate, in fact my next door neighbor, was coming from the shower. He immediately noticed my distress and quickly asked, "What happened to you?" I answered, "I don't know." He only mananged to break his stride enough to step over me as he walked out the door.

I staggered over to the mirror with apprehension to survey the damage. I stared in the mirror, cringed at the blood and noticed that my tooth had penetrated my bottom lip. Outside the door I overheard voices saying "Why don't you go in and help him..." I waited a moment and then realized that no one was coming. I walked down the hall and saw several of the people who live on my floor. NOT ONE asked if they could assist me in any way. I got my coat and keys and with a wet paper towel covering my bleeding lip I started out of the dorm. I ran into my RA in the front lobby. He asked, "Are you going to be all right?" I answered, "I hope so." He asked, "Are you going to the infirmary?" I answered, "Yes." He mumbled, "OK..." I walked from my dorm alone to the infirmary.

I went through the usual infirmary bureaucracy and was treated by a pleasant and professional EMT. Next the doctor came and placed five stitches in my lower lip. He told me what happened was a common medical condition, the exact terminology he used escapes me now, where if a person rises too quickly, there is a drop in their blood pressure which can cause the kind of fainting spell I experienced.

I left the infirmary and began to walk back to Northeast thinking over the entire episode. My lip was pulsing with pain and I had a huge ice bag on my lip. I said a short prayer to God thanking him for leaving me enough strength to help myself to the infirmary. Heaven forbid I should have hit my head in another spot and had needed the assistance of one of the people in my dorm. Would anyone have had the good conscience and common sense to call an ambulance if I were lying bleeding and unconscious on the floor of the bathroom? Even if the other people in the dorm were somehow too busy to assist, one could only hope that an RA, an individual trained and paid to be at the assistance of the residents, would at least offer some aid.

Somehow the entire incident seemed too cold and callous to comprehend. By this time I was re-entering my dorm, and because of my not-too-inconspicuous ice pack, I received a number of stares. Again, no one even asked me what had happened or if I was okay. I went to my room and sat with the ice pack on my lip and I really had time to think about the people with whom I live.

These people are not merely "hi and bye" acquaintances. These same people I talk to every day, have classes with, loan my notes and typewriter to, and have developed something of a friendly rapport with. It is almost impossible for me to believe. I come from the suburbs of Boston and I have seen people hurt in the streets of Boston get more assistance from perfect strangers. I can hardly understand how people you know could be less caring.

After an hour my roommate returned from an evening of studying and bombarded me with a host of questions about my condition. Not one of these people who were so concerned about my condition bothered to come by personally and see how I was doing.

I sit here now in the solitude of the early morning hours writing this and wondering who I can depend on in a time of need.

JESSE HELMS DILEMMA: TO STAY ON AS CHAIRMAN OF THE AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE AND PROTECT TOBACCO OR TO BECOME CHAIRMAN OF THE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE

Bicyclists on campus: keep off the sidewalks

I know that for many students, the only means of transportation is the bicycle. But with such a high number of students and professors on campus, the bicycle becomes a dangerous machine. According to Massachusetts law, bicyclists have to take the same responsibilities as motorists by following the rules of the road, and therefore, should ride in restricted areas; that is, the street.

Two major problems with bicycles on campus are that they create accidents and frighten many pedestrians.

This fall there have been many accidents on campus. For example, while walking from Southwest towards Whitmore Building I saw an ignorant bicyclist hit a two-year-old child. The child was thrown into the air and began crying. Because of the speed of the bicyclist, it took 15 feet for him to skid to a complete stop. Why are these bicycle accidents allowed to occur on a heavily populated campus? Because the bicyclists are speeding and are selfish about their riding. There is another concern.

Bicyclists frighten people constantly. For instance, recently on my way to Goodell Library a bicyclist sped by me, missing me by about two inches. This caused me to jump clear off the walkway. Because of the inconsiderate speeding bicyclists and pedestrian fear I feel that the best solution would be to eliminate bicycles from campus walkways. Students and professors should use surrounding streets coming into campus, and upon arriving on campus should lock their bicycles at provided racks. They will be allowed to walk their bicycles on the walkways.

With the help of the students, professors and administration this problem of accidents and fear can be corrected.

James Cohen is a UMass student.

Why the dishroom workers aren't whistling

I guess it must be the time of the year. Christmas songs join the selections on the jukebox, decorations are prominent everywhere. The Christmas season has everyone in a party-hearty mood...everyone, that is, but the dining commons workers.

Being one said worker, I say this because every night I go to my place of employment in Southwest, and face a mess. It doesn't have to be that way. Hasn't anybody seen that notice posted where you dispose the trays? It asks politely that you dispose of the paper, and place the silverware to one side of the tray. Common sense displays that there is a reason for this request. Obviously it is important.

Then why do people constantly disregard this plea and do the opposite? Paper napkins and butter pats can be found everywhere imaginable: under plates of food, piled on top of salad plates, even stuffed into the bottom of glasses with dinner rolls pushed into the top for good measure. This display not only makes the dishroom attendents exasperated, it wastes time and can result in a hazardous broken glass situation.

Patrons of our DC can be particularly artistic as well as enlightening.

For instance, did you know salt has an odor? I discovered this when I encountered the infamous pillar of salt on a plate. I must tell the anonymous artist that the spoon hidden beneath the pile was not hilarious to me!

It's amazing how flexible certain utensils can be. Spoons are the most abused, (I've seen them practically braided!) but forks have been known to have bent handles or twisted tines. However, knives folded in half make my skin crawl. These are heavy metal pieces of cutlery and to match the amount of strength needed to mend them to the size of the individual, well, let's just say I do not want to meet this person in a dark alley.

But seriously—would you do these things at your house? Or your grandmother's house? In a few years you may be invited to your boss's house for dinner. When dessert is served, will you eat it calmly or will the hostess find whipped cream under the chairs, and butter in the place of it?

One last thing—those of you who are responsible for the above stunts—take heart. Some day you will have your own places and can do what you want with the food you are served. Until then, please think about the dishroom workers trying to find dishes under mounds of food and paper. Read, and follow the signs, and we can serve you better.

Happy holidays.

Letters to the Editor

Trying to clarify the situation

On Wednesday, November 14, the Collegian printed an article titled "Trustees Reject Constitution" which was misleading. On behalf of the task force which is working out problems that exist between the SGA and the University administration, I would like to clarify the situation. The issues are pretty confusing, so it is easy to understand the mistake.

The headline was completely inaccurate. The Trustees have not rejected the constitution. In fact, they have not considered it. To understand where the constitution is currently it is necessary to review the history of the constitution. Last spring the SGA, after lengthy debate, approved a constitution. The SGA constitution sets the structure for the SGA and its various components, and protects the rights of students in the areas of student discipline, students fees, and participation in University decision making. After the students had completed the document we submitted it to the administration to start the process of Trustee approval. Naturally, there were differences between what the administration wanted and what the SGA wanted. We set up a committee to mediate out the differences and we were successful in resolving almost every problem. There were three areas of disagreement: control over buildings funded by a student fee, control of the Student Activities Trust Fund, and the rights of students in the judicial process. It was then sent to the Trustees for approval with the Chancellor suggesting three changes.

When the Trustees received the constitution, however, they tabled it to the University Attorney for review. He has written a series of comments about the constitution. To try and respond to these a task force has been created with representatives from the SGA, the campus administration, and the University President's office. So far the work has been progressing and we have reached many agreements. Basically, our challenge is to decide what comments are justified problems for the University, and what can be done to change those to fit both the SGA's and the University's intent. The major disputes are the three areas mentioned above. In the interim the SGA is operating under the constitution passed last spring.

New code making progress

The reporter who wrote the article regarding the pending revisions to the Code of Student Conduct unfortunately omitted several features that I had stressed to him, and misquoted me. I believe it is important for all concerned to understand that revising the Code is an arduous process and requires the cooperation of many constituencies—and I thought I had made it clear to the writer that it was fortunate in this regard that the students, notwithstanding the many demands on their time, had been extremely helpful and thoughtful. The article, as written, leaves the impression that this is not the case. Further, I indicated that considerable progress has been made and that there was substantial agreement on more than half of the Code revisions. So, in fact, the Code is not in limbo, and I believe all concerned believe that a revised Code will indeed be a reality for the next school year. The campus community will certainly be kept informed about the status of this important document as it proceeds through the various committees and administrative levels. Thank you.

Editor's note: The reporter stands by his notes and maintains Brooks was correctly quoted.

An open letter to the Board of Governors:

You are in charge of this institution of learning and, in firing Cliff Meyer you were projecting your sense of ethics on this school, as is your job. Ethics is well and good but its place is secondary to education. And as part of our education system you're actually educating us by example. You have taught me to be frustrated, second class and ashamed.

We do not live in a world of education. We live in a labor society. Even if we forget this fact, to cut us as students, from the most common forms of entertainment is ludicrous and irresponsible. Are you trying to isolate us as students?

When seeing a teacher in the hall, I asked, "How was your Thanksgiving?" Her reply was,"Good, I got very coked out." Needless to say, her answer was a joke. Are we here at UMass going to track this teacher down and condemn her?

I think the firing of Meyer was ridiculous and I call for his immediate rehiring.

Letters between friends

By PETER WISSOKER
Collegian Staff

This book is a collection of Vita Sackville-West's letters to Virginia Woolf. Sackville-West was Woolf's lover in the middle twenties and the two remained friends until Woolf's death in 1941.

Like Woolf, Sackville West was a writer, very prolific and well known in her time although now largely forgotten. She is best know for her book The Edwardians and her poem The Land. She also wrote travel books, based on her trips to meet her husband, Harold Nicolson, who was himself a writer as well as a diplomat and a Member of Parliament.

Unfortunately, Vita just didn't produce the kinds of letters that Woolf herself did. Often the letters are dry, and excerpts from Woolf's letters that are printed to provide continuity seem to shine in comparison. Yet Sackville-West's writing is not always drab. Once she overcomes her self-imposed intimidation (I, write to the Virginia Woolf?) the letters do become more interesting although considering the level of intensity of their relationship there seems to be something missing.

But Vita Sackville-West's skill as a writer should not be underestimated. The travel letters she writes from India, Persia, Egypt and particularly the United States in 1933 are both interesting and entertaining. There is something (je ne sais quoi, French majors) about the letters that keeps the reader reading which is rare for a book of letters.

Both Vita Sackville-West and Virginia Woolf are important writers of this century and those who have read their works will find this book a welcome addition to the evergrowing collection of documentation of the writers of the first half of the twentieth century. However, these letters will never be a substitute for reading the works themselves.

Arts

live wire
by Peter Wissoker

It figures just as your work load increases there appears an incredible amount of good music this weekend.

Even tonight it isn't an easy choice. At the Iron Horse, Grateful Dead lyricist Robert Hunter will be playing two sets. He hasn't been the same since he learned to play the guitar but he is still one of the few living rock troubadours.

Meanwhile at the Rusty Nail, in Sunderland, you can see three really great bands for the price of one. The Mongrel Puppy, Barrence Whitfield and the Savages, and Boston's own Del Fuegos will be playing. Since Hanger One closed and the Blue Wall started bringing a Blues band once every few months there hasn't been a good place to see new wave bands, but now.

George Thorogood and The Delaware Destroyers will be playing with NRBQ at the Springfield Civic Center on Friday Night. There are still good tickets left and George Thorogood plays like you wouldn't believe. I saw him like five years ago and it's still one of the best shows I've ever seen.

Friday brings Flyer to the Rusty Nail for two nights and Saturday Chris Smither to the Iron Horse. James Montgomery will be at th Red Balloon in Easthampton and Sarah Vaughn will be in the Fine Arts Center.

Then it seems like one would want to get a room at the Hotel Northampton because Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday a small calvacade of stars appear at the Iron Horse. Sunday, the woman who makes Bonnie Raitt sound like an old fart, Ellen Mellwaine, will play. She plays wicked electric guitar and tells the truth. On Monday, New Wave acapellaists, the Bobs, will make their East Coast debut. A mixture of Devo and Manhatten Transfer, the Bobs seem to be all the rage over on the other coast.

On Tuesday a man who is on the cutting edge of the avant garde, solo percussionist David Moss, will appear. Moss is perhaps best remembered for his show last year with Fred Frith in Brattleboro. Moss has broken down the barriers of tone and time. To see him performing solo is exciting.

On Monday night Big Twist and the Mellow Fellows, third generation Chicago big band blues musicians will be at the Blue Wall.

In the future: Robin Trower will be at the Rusty Nail a week from Sunday and Taj Mahal will be at the Iron Horse on December 10 and 11.

Bobs Contest: We have five, count 'em five tickets to give away for the Bobs show on Monday night. All you have to do is identify the group which first performed the song "Live Wire." Come down to the Collegian Arts desk between 3 and 6 in the afternoon between now and Monday if you know the answer.

Big Twist & the Mellow Fellows

The Bobs

A local 'roots band' revival

by JON STRYMISH
Collegian Staff

The term "roots band" was coined in the sixties to describe bands like the Rolling Stones and The Who who reintroduced the rhythm and blues and honky tonk traditions to popular culture. Roots bands have come back into popularity in the last few years. This fall three local bands, The Mongrel Puppy, The The Del Fuegos, and Barrance Whitfield and the Savages, have all produced startlingly good first records, all mining from past culture. All three bands appear at the Rusty Nail tonight.

The Del Fuegos' The Longest Day is destined to be a huge commercial success. They are a young band (one member, Ork Boy Zanes, joined right after high school) and they like to make noise. Slash records tried to cure them of this by polishing up their sound and adding keyboards. The effect was not horrid or tacky as I would expect but instead is satisfying, giving the band the warmest sound in town. Their live show is not as polished but does still show signs of the workout Slash put them through. The Del Fuegos are a roots band in the most literal sense. Influences like The Rolling Stones, Johnny Cash and Hank Williams are running rampant through this record. Lead singer Tom Zanes' voice is very expressive, almost like Neil Young, but enough power so that no one has to feel sorry for him. The Del Fuegos' roots come from the dignified rhythm and blues, Woody Guthrie's simplicity, your baby and your 4/4 rock and roll rhythm being pushed to its limit.

The Del Fuegos succeed because of their deep harmonies, strong melodies and surprise touches, such as a drum solo on the song "Nervous and Shaky" that sounds like it was played on a trash can. (Actually it was played on hubcaps).

Trash cans mix with this type of music well. I think many people will find themselves whistling to the first single "Backseat Nothing" and wondering who this group is.

Barrance Whitfield and the Savages have titles like "Bip Bop Bip" and "Mama Get the Hammer." They're fast, heavy on the bass and sax, and that man can really blow.

The inspiration is the 50's of "Happy Days," "Be Bop a Lula," and "Rock Around the Clock," wailing words without meaning for the pure joy of the sound.

Barrance Whitfield is a black r & b singer who reminds me a little of Little Richard. The Savages, (Howard Ferguson, Phil Lenker, Peter Greenberg) are all former members of the Lyres, another band whose first record did not live up to expectations. The three Savages left the Lyres before their record was released and formed their band with saxaphone player Steve Legrega to play their own form of blues. They say this is because they "prefer the Negro sound."

Two thirds of the songs on their records are cover versions of obscure cuts by singers such as Bobby Moore, almost famous for "searching, searching for my baby," who wrote "Go Ahead and Burn"; or Big Al Downing, a country singer from Worcester who penned "Georgia Slop." Though most songs are covers, the Savages completely retool them to their personality.

Exploring heroism and fantasy

By FRAN WEINBERG
Collegian Correspondent

Most people associate the word heroine with a female, and hero with a male. "Not so," says Lee Edwards, UMass English Professor, and currently the first woman to be working in the Dean's office. Edwards explores the topic of Women as Hero in her book, Psyche as Hero Female Heroism and Fictional Form.

A hero is someone who transcends the norm. They are never "good", in the moral sense, but are interested in transforming the morals and values of a society. In order for this shift to happen, people must be dissatisfied with the present society. Heroines, who are mainly women, could almost be considered the opposite of heroes. They are the upholders of what is good and moral in a society. We are not used to seeing women in positions of breaking away; they are almost always put in the position of trying to perpetuate the status quo.

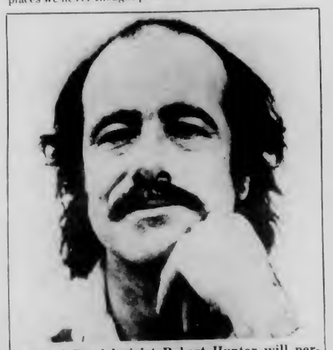
"The hero is always fiction", Edwards said. "Always bigger than life. To be a hero is to stop being a human being. A hero must always be socially responsible." It is confusing to think of the hero as non fictional. Lee explains that a great amount of sadness and loneliness would accompany a real life hero, while a fictional hero could overcome any such obstacles.

In her book Psyche as Hero, Edward uses European and American novels of the 18th, 19th, and 20th century, to trace the changing ways women are viewed in patriarchal culture. Characters become more heroic as women begin taking chances and stepping out of traditional roles. Lee sees this as evolution. "Freedom comes from within marriage and family, later from work and community, then from art, then from within an imaginative sphere, where women can be glimpsed as the divine creator."

When asked what she would like readers to have in mind when reading her book she said "sex and gender are unimportant. We need heroes. Without heroes we are stuck, we have nothing to hope for, no one to make the break which will lead us to a utopian society. Without heroes, there is no way of envisioning a better world."

When asked about the heroes of today, and the shift towards conservatism she said, "today we have a desire to make Ronald Reagan our Cowboy hero." She sees this as a problem. We may depend on one man to fulfill our wishes for a good society, but what happens if he cannot succeed?

It is important for us to start to view women as heroes as well as heroines. Heroes are fantasy. Through fantasy we can explore the possibilities in which women can change their lives and have an impact on others. This will allow us to further our own lives, and pursue our own goals to places we never thought possible.



Grateful Dead lyricist Robert Hunter will perform at the Iron Horse tonight.

He said it's very difficult to choose one player as the best in the nation.

"You might be able to compare two running backs. You might be able to compare two linemen," he said. "But as far as picking the best athlete across the country, the best college football player, it's almost impossible."

Flutie finds other comparisons those among Heisman Trophy winners hard to accept.

"I really can't picture myself in that type of category with Herschel Walker, O.J. Simpson...guys down the line who have won it," he said.

"When you're growing up, you're looking at it all from a distance. It's in a fantasyland," Flutie said. "But when you get near it an you see the actual presentation of the award, it's realistic to me. You say, 'hey, someone's got to win it.'"

UMass primes to give Florida cold reception

Women look for first victory

By JOHN A. NOLAN
Collegian Staff

Coming off a tough opening season loss, the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team hopes to even their record as they battle the University of Florida at 8 p.m. tonight at Amherst College.

However, the team may need more than hope and a lot of inside help if it expects to pull off an upset.

"We are the clear underdog, no doubt about it," said UMass coach Barbara Stevens. "But we are not shaking in our boots."

Florida comes off its best season ever (19-9) with all five starters returning from last year's 19th ranked ballclub.

UMass hopes of stopping the Gators rest on shutting down 6-3 senior scorer Tammy Jackson. Jackson comes off her third consecutive season as an All South Eastern Conference pick and is considered one of the nation's top college players.

UMass meanwhile, comes off a shaky performance against Boston College which saw the Minutemen shoot a dismal 40 percent from the floor and the starting five outscored by the bench 33-25. For the team to be competitive, the shooting will definitely have to improve. Problems for the Minutemen remain it's inside game and point production from starters Jerrie Bernier, Rebecca Kucks and Susan Burtoft who had a collective three points against Boston College.

A much smaller team, the Minutemen must get strong inside play to offset the power of the Gators, a team averaging well over six feet.

"Against Boston College, we really got hurt off the boards," said Stevens. "We're going to have to work for our rebounds to beat Florida."

However, the bread and butter of the Minutemen remains its run-and-gun brand of offense. If the team is able to set its running game in motion, Massachusetts fans can look for a wide open high scoring affair.

"We're really going to have to utilize our fast breaks," said Stevens. "Without them, the pressure really lies on our inside game."

At stake is not merely a basketball game, but north-south pride between two of the nation's strongest conferences. However, Stevens is quick to point out that pressure is not on her team.

"The pressure is on them to beat us," Stevens said. "Being in their position, they have a lot more to lose than we do. But make no mistake, we're going to go out and show them that New England basketball can be just as competitive as it is in the SEC."

Anyone planning to attend tonight's game can take either the Mount Holyoke bus or any of the PVTA buses running through downtown Amherst. Try to arrive early as the gym is expected to be packed.

UMass women's basketball Barbara Stevens expects a tough game from the University of Florida tonight.

New England title in reach

UM gets top swimmer

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

The University of Iowa would probably not want to be known as a farm team for the University of Massachusetts men's swim team, but there may be a New England title in the Minutemen's future thanks to the Hawkeyes.

Coach Russ Yarworth said yesterday that Drew Donovan will attend UMass next semester and put to use the swimming talent that qualified him for the NCAA championships two years ago.

Donovan quit school two years ago and recently contacted Yarworth about attending UMass. He was accepted into the College of Arts and Sciences by the Admissions Office yesterday.

"This will give us the New England title," Yarworth predicted. "Along with Craig Fuller (who also came from the Iowa program) we'll have our best team in 10 years."

Donovan, who will have a year and half of eligibility left at UMass, is a freestyler with times that will win him New England and Atlantic 10 championships.

He has done a 1:38.0 200 freestyle, a :44.0 100 freestyle and a 4:24.0 500 freestyle. To put his ability in perspective, the UMass record in the 200 free is 1:46. Donovan's times in both the 100 and 500 would have easily won the New England last year.

Yarworth was the last UMass swimmer to place highly in the New Englands with a second in 1978. UMass hasn't won a New England team title since the early 1970s.

"I won't believe it until he's on the blocks," Yarworth said. "But he'll be at the Lowell meet on Saturday (at Boyden at 7 p.m.) and it seems definite. It sure looks good for us, real good."

Flutie avoids speculation

NEWTON, Mass. (AP) Wherever he goes now, Doug Flutie hears the talk. Clear a spot in your home for the Heisman Trophy. He scrambles to avoid it as if it were a huge defensive lineman trying to crush him.

"Every person I meet is telling me, 'Oh, you've got it made, you've got it won,'" says Boston College's record busting quarterback. "I don't want to let myself believe it's a shoo-in because it's not and if I let myself believe that, I'm in for a big let down."

His talented competition is Ohio State running back Keith Byars and Miami quarterback Bernie Kosar. They are the three finalists invited to the trophy presentation.

"Keith Byars is bigger, he's stronger, he's faster, he can run with the ball," said Flutie, the only senior in the group. "He's a tremendous athlete." Kosar, who nearly matched Flutie's brilliant aerial performance in Boston College's thrilling 47-45 victory over Miami last Friday, "is a class quarterback," Flutie added. "He played the best game I've

Just a few thoughts...

This will be a first for a New England newspaper column-the quarterback from Boston College will not be mentioned by name throughout the entire column. Yes, that's right, no once...After this Saturday, this particular young man will jump right out of Fitton Field at Holy Cross and into a helicopter, where he will pick up some trophy called the Heisman in New York City and probably then be a first-round draft pick in the NFL. Enough said.

What I found questionable about the BC-Miami game was the play-calling of coach Jack Bicknell. Late in the game BC has a first-and-goal at Miami's seven. Instead of letting the BC quarterback do his thing, he calls three running plays and BC is forced to make a field goal. Had you know who not made that absolutely incredible pass, a BC loss would have definitely been blamed on Bicknell.

Another coach who surprised me with his play-calling was Dallas' Tom Landry. I know it's easy to second-guess now and Landry is one of the best, but he made some decisons he usually doesn't make. For instance, on two separate occasions, Landry, on third and about one to two, would run Tony Dorsett up the middle. Dorsett would gain one small step for the Cowboys, and three giant steps backwards for the Pats...But the blunder of the game came from kicker Tony Franklin. After the Pats tied it up, Franklin tried a squib kick, which was way too hard and Dallas ended up with excellent field position and later went on to win the game. Franklin, after the game, said "I just don't understand it." Great, Tony. The dog ate you homework, too.

College hoop is underway and while Georgetown finishes off their poi and surfing from their "vaction" in Hawaii, other clubs have already looked impressive.

Louisville is usually predicted in the top ten, but this year, they weren't. This is why Denny Crum may have the makings of a final four team. Nobody plays a tougher schedule in the beginning and when their freshmen mature, they will be tough to stop...Also watch out for Maryland. They've had a rough start but Lefty Dreisell and company have a lot of players returning.

Pro basketball is also in high gear. There are a few people who don't know that the Celtics are the best team in basketball. These people also think Mondale still has a chance...The Eastern Divison is getting tighter in the race for second place. The Bulletts are playing a very physical game and the Knicks (much to Abraham's displeasure) have a seven game win streak. True, they have played teams that Barbizon School of Modeling could beat, but they are playing solid hoop.

In other news, our old friend Dennis Eckersley became the newest millionaire as he signs with the Cubs. Apparently, Dallas Green likes to invest in rubber cause that's what he's getting with Eck's arm...Finally, anyone who doesn't think the guy from Natick should win the Heisman should be sentenced to ten minutes in the ring with Kamala, the Ugandan giant. Roddy Piper will be the guest referee.

No more need be said.

No pass/fail for required courses come Fall '86

By LAURA YEE
Collegian Staff

The faculty senate yesterday passed an amendment to the general education proposal prohibiting students from taking required courses pass/fail.

The amendment, added to the proposal that would replace the present C, D and E core requirements to courses in areas designated as "social world," "biological world" and "analytical reasoning," was not passed unopposed by the faculty. The proposal, designed to "tighten up" the present core requirements and supply students with "breadth of knowledge," would effect all incoming students in the fall of 1986 and thereafter.

Steven Zeil, professor of computer and informational science, said eliminating the pass/fail option would cause students to "flood" the easier courses.

"No pass/fail will channel the students into easier courses and then they will not dare to take more challenging ones," he said.

But Gerald McFarland, a history professor said, "Many students feel that pass/fail course is the least important" and therefore put less effort into that class. "I hear students say, 'all I need is a D to pass,'" he said.

With a pass/fail option for general education courses, McFarland said the purpose of the proposal would be a "waste." He said the proposal is designed to give students a more, well rounded education and would be wasted by the the pass/fail option because students would put in a minimal effort to pass the course.

Harry Schumer, professor of psychology, said 10 to 20 percent of all courses are taken on the pass/fail option.

"Students do show less motivation" in courses taken pass/fail, Schumer said. But students also take in courses that are more challenging, "knowing that the option is available," he added.

In other senate news, the motion to approve the Program and Budget Council's report on funding for the general education bill was tabled because it lacked clarity.

"I'm glad they tabled it (the motion)," John L. DeNyse, vice chancellor of administration and finance said. He said the report was not clear in whether the funds would come from the Board of Regents 1987 fiscal year new program request process, a reallocation of money in the current University budget or external sources.

Robert Welch, an assistant to Dennis L. Madson, vice chancellor for student affairs, said the costs were broken down into "four major areas."

One-time administration costs were estimated at $152,000 to $242,000. The one-time cost of hiring teaching assistants for an additional 400 students who will be taking analytical reasoning courses is estimated at a maximum of $20,000. The plan will cost $100,000 to $268,000 a year for ongoing costs.

The "biological and physical world" requirement would generate an ongoing minimum cost of $40,000 to $210,000 for instructors, and the recently added amendment requiring students to take at least one science with a laboratory component would add $200,000 for one time costs and $30,000 and $120,000 for ongoing costs.

The program and budget facet will instead be voted on with the entire general education proposal.

Dairy Mart: McDonald's of the future

By LARRY BOUCHIE
Collegian Staff

Convenience stores "will be the McDonalds of tomorrow" predicted the founder of the Dairy Mart chain to an audience of about 100 University Investment Club members last evening.

"Ten years from now, you'll stop in at the convenience store for that hamburger," Charles Nirenberg said.

Having already added a delicatessen counter and gasoline facilities to his own stores, Nirenberg also revealed that automatic banking machines, rental video equipment and movies, and fresh flowers may soon be for sale at Dairy Marts.

"As I see it, there's plenty of room for growth," Nirenberg said, "and this is an exciting, young growth company."

Nirenberg said that he "never really expected" to be involved in business, but realized as a young man that he could operate a variety store for a small investment and do so with one exception.

"That exception was that, instead of just putting up that Coca-Cola sign, we put one up that also said Dairy Mart," Nirenberg said. "So, in 1958, we opened the first one."

By 1972, there were 32 outlets, and after presenting "such a good deal that I couldn't refuse," a larger corporation bought the chain, though Nirenberg remained president. But the business was not as healthy as he had been led to believe, Nirenberg said.

"I became a paper millionaire, but the following year, they went bankrupt, so I was a paper pauper," he said, "and that is the great thing about the American system. You have the right to succeed and you have the right to fail, that's the equalizer."

Determined to retain his company, Nirenberg said that he used the only asset he had left, a good reputation. After convincing a banking institution to refinance the chain, Nirenberg began to bring the company back to financial health.

Nirenberg said that the chain has just opened its 200th outlet, and projected sales for this year are almost $100 million.

Birth control a long battle, say lawyers

By REBECCA THATCHER
Collegian Staff

Roe v. Wade, the U.S. Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion in 1973, was the culmination of 25 years of lawyers' efforts to make abortion a woman's right, according to three lawyers who spoke at Hampshire College last night.

Lawyers Nancy Stearns, from the New York state Attorney General's office, Nadine Taub from the Women's Rights Litigation Clinic in Newark, N.J. and Catherine Roroback, whose victory in a contraception case in Connecticut helped to set a precedent for Roe v. Wade, spoke at the last panel discussion of the "Abortion: right under siege" series.

Roroback said Roe v. Wade was based on the 1958 Griswold v. Connecticut that made contraception legal for married women in Connecticut.

It was a big victory, Roroback said, because, "Connecticut and Massachusetts were the two most reactionary states in the union on the subject of contraception and abortion."

Through the '60s, anything that prevented conception was illegal in Massachusetts, she said.

The Comstock laws, which made contraception illegal, were based on the Victorian ethic which prescribed that women stay in the home and that sex for any reason other than procreation was immoral, the panelists said.

One of the most important methods the lawyers used was to advocate reproductive freedoms by women's personal testimony, Stearn said. She said she would never forget an English woman's story about coming out of anesthesia after an illegal abortion and realizing that the abortionist had raped her.

What emerged from the personal testimony by hundreds of women was that abortion laws were a violation of the right to equal protection under the law for women, Stearn said.

Econ index falls, recession possible

WASHINGTON (AP) The government's main economic forecasting gauge fell in October for the third time in five months, the Commerce Department reported yesterday as economists bemoaned an economy they said was "sputtering" or maybe even slipping toward a mild recession.

The 0.7 percent October decline in the Index of Leading Economic Indicators marked the first time since the recessionary year of 1981 that the index had dropped in as many as three of five months.

At the White House, presidential spokesman Larry Speakes said that although "obviously we're in a period of economic slowdown...we don't think this is an indication of recessionary tendencies."

At the same time, private economists described the economy as very sluggish, and one of them said his firm's forecast was "within arm's length of a recession."

There were no predictions, however, that such a business downturn if it should occur would be as long or severe as the 1981 82 recession.

A string of negative indicators has preceded every recession for decades, but Commerce Secretary Malcolm Baldrige has been quick to point out that there have also been such negative trends that were followed by merely slow economic growth rather than outright recession.

Baldrige called his department's new report "disappointing." But he also said he expected improvement next month and declared, "We are not heading into another recession."

Reagan makes choice for new head of EPA

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Reagan yesterday chose Lee M. Thomas, who supervised toxic waste cleanups as a chief deputy to Environmental Protection Agency administrator William D. Ruckelshaus, as the new head of the agency.

Ruckelshaus, meanwhile, said that reported dismay over Reagan administration environmental policies "didn't have anything to do" with his decision to resign.

Thomas, 40, has been serving as assistant administrator of the agency in charge of the "superfund" toxic waste dump cleanup program. His nomination is subject to Senate confirmation.

Thomas joined the EPA in 1983 after a two-year stint as associate director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. In that job, he managed all disaster relief efforts at FEMA and was chairman of the president's task force on toxic waste problems at Times Beach, Mo.

Since July 1983, Thomas has been serving as assistant administrator of EPA for solid waste and emergency response. He served as acting deputy administrator of EPA for six months in 1983.

Two sources, who spoke only on condition they not be identified, had said that Thomas was Ruckelshaus' choice as a successor.

House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John D. Dingell, D-Mich., said he was concerned about Ruckelshaus' departure, but added that he had found Thomas to be "capable, truthful and a good administrator. I have no basis on which to criticize his appointment."

In an interview on the CBS "Morning News" program, Ruckelshaus said, "I'm not fed up with anything."

Rep. James Scheuer, D-N.Y., a vigorous critic of President Reagan's environmental policies, said he suspected Ruckelshaus resigned because of a 30 percent cut in EPA's budget proposed to the president by the Office of Management and Budget.

Theorist warns of western technology dangers

Jeremy Rifkin lectures to a packed audience

By TOM MIDDLETON
Collegian Staff

Values held by Western society are leading to crises in resource consumption and biotechnology, with possible calamitous effects on civilization, according to author and social theorist Jeremy Rifkin.

Rifkin expressed his opposition to genetic engineering and attitudes on resource consumption in a speech to about 200 faculty and students at Morrill Auditorium last night. The lecture, which lasted two hours, was sponsored by the Distinguished Visitors Program and the department of biochemistry.

Philosophers, scientists and political theorists since the 15th century have shaped Western values to assume that resources are unlimited and are to be used to improve the quality of life without affecting the environment in a significant way, Rifkin said.

According to the economic theories of the British political thinker John Locke, material resources in nature are wasted unless they are used by society, Rifkin said. In reality, he said, the potential uses of resources are the value, and once they are used by society, they are turned into waste.

Rifkin said genetic engineering is the "most impressive technological intervention into nature since the introduction of fire." With fire, we can weld, melt and mold materials, he said. Genetic engineering will allow us to mold and join different traits of different species, he said.

"Genetic engineering has tremendous short run benefits to it," Rifkin said. Among these benefits are medicines, more productive farm animals, and the genetic elimination of certain diseases, he said.

The problem is that the more impressive the technology, the more it affects the environment, he said. Citing nuclear technology, Rifkin said, waste from nuclear reactors takes 10,000 years to lose half its radioactivity. Cave paintings by early humans found in Europe are 10,000 years old, Rifkin said. Only now are government agencies finding ways to protect future generations from the danger, he said.

Rifkin has written several books on these issues including, Who Should Play God?, Entropy: A New World View and Algeny. He has testified before Congress, made television appearances, lectured and filed lawsuits to raise public awareness of the dangers of genetic engineering.

Ex UMass president honored

Mather paved the way for autonomy

By LARRY ROUCHIE
Collegian staff

When Jean Paul Mather became president of the University of Massachusetts in 1954, he considered the University to be "the most politically controlled" land grant college in the country.

Forced to resign five years later after embroiling the state Legislature in a battle over who would control University hiring and financing, Mather was honored yesterday with a luncheon at Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey's on-campus residence.

When Mather was president the Legislature was responsible for hiring all administrators and faculty and administrating the University's funds.

"We cannot be sure our present faculty will remain," Mather said in a 1959 TIME magazine interview. "What is worse, we cannot go out and recruit this fall because we have absolutely nothing to offer."

Believing that the University must have autonomy from the Legislature, Mather took his case to the public and was forced out of office by the Legislature. Control of the University was turned over to the UMass Board of Trustees during the next president's term.

Dean of Students William Field, who was a professor at the time, recalled that Mather demanded "a certain standard quality and insisted that we be a first rate institution, and he told the Legislature so."

"He made people angry because he forced the issue and made (the Legislature) look at something they didn't want to look at," Field said.

Chancellor Duffey said Mather's contribution should be recognized because he prompted the "idea that universities need a measure of autonomy and provision for self-governence if they are to flourish and to serve society well."

"The idea is not that universities should not be accountable to outside authorities," Duffey said, "(but) is based upon the idea that conditions which sustain an atmosphere of freedom of thought and inquiry require freedom from centralized control."

Mather, whose professional background is in business, economics, and statistics, noted that while "all land grant schools have engineering and science...I certainly endorse the liberal arts concept."

"I'm still a supporter of liberal study because you need that underpinning. You may be able to talk to machines (as an engineer), but that's not the way to talk to humanity," he said.

> "He made people angry because he forced the issue and made (the Legislature) look at something they didn't want to look at."
> — Dean of Students William Field, speaking of former UMass President Mather

Former Chancellor Ralph Bromery also praised Mather, saying "Without fiscal autonomy, and the ability to manage our resources, we would not have been on the way to becoming a great University.

"A lot of people in the Commonwealth would have been cheated from a low cost, high quality education," he said.

John W. Lederle, who succeeded Mather, said "It was tough to follow Mather. I got more commiseration than I got congratulations. People asked me why would I take the job.

"But it was a little easier and it's becoming more so, now that we have the support of the governor and are beginning to get more support from the Legislature," he said.

During Lederle's term, control of the University was turned over from the Legislature to the Board of Trustees.

Office space changes for student groups

By JOHN VINCENT
and GREG BROWN
Collegian Staff

The Campus Center Board of Governors last night opened up space for a new WMUA radio station business office by taking away room 454 of the Student Union Building from the Islamic Association student group.

BOG chairman Bob Abele said that the Islamic Association failed to make the effort to defend its space after being sufficiently warned that it was going to be taken away. Abele said the space committee decided to take the space because it was not being fullly used.

WMUA will move its business material into one-half of room 454. Bill Stepchew, chief engineer of WMUA, said that papers are piling up in the studios causing a work problem, and there are too many people using too little space.

The State Student Association of Massachusetts and Students Advocating Financial Aid, will move into the other half of the room, giving both groups more room than they had before.

WMUA was also scheduled to move its office in the tunnel to the Spectrum magazine office, Campus Center room 104 after the new WMUA office has been remodeled to fit the security needs of Spectrum, which Managing Editor Charles Carroll said needs a locked closet and walls, instead of the partial barriers common in Student Union Building offices, to protect the expensive artwork Spectrum deals with.

In other BOG news, the alternative beverages committee announced their plans for a "Battle of the Bands" at the Bluewall Cafe next Thursday night, during which no alcohol will be served. Bob Cohen of the committee said there will be free food and drink, with a $1 cover charge, and if the event succeeds, the committee will consider more regular non-alcohol nights at the Bluewall.

Also, the board nominated candidates for its chair position, which Robert Abele will vacate at the end of the semester. Nominated were Heidi Parks, Bob Cohen, Karen Karina Gray, and Jane Donahue.

Duffey will visit Argentina to plan exchange program

University of Massachusetts Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey will travel to Argentina next Friday to arrange a professional exchange between this University and that country.

During his week-long stay, Duffey will meet with students, faculty and administrators from several Argentine universities to choose a Latin American scholar who would come to UMass to teach, and then return to Argentina to introduce certain American subjects into the country's higher education curriculum.

Director of International Programs at UMass, Barbara Burn, said Argentina has many good universities, and "we've had an exchange since 1970 with Argentina where we receive Argentinian students here for the spring semester and then send (UMass) students there to study during the summer."

Duffey said this new exchange was primarily initiated by University history professor Robert Potash, a Latin American historian, last summer began examining "what we might do to strengthen our relationship with Argentina right now," Duffey said.

A memo from the United States Information Agency, signed by the agency's director Charles Z. Wick, states "I have asked the Bureau of Education and Cultural Affairs to look into your Argentine scholarship proposal immediately. I will get back to you shortly with some thoughts on how we might respond to this."

During his visit, Duffey will be staying with the American ambassador to Argentina, Frank V. Ortiz.

Taub, who said the reproductive rights litigation had "changed her life," described the mindset of the judges who were against abortion.

"There was a judge in Ohio who said women who danced had to pay the piper," she said.

Taub said she now works against sterilization forced upon poor and minority women, but that in the early '70s she had represented a woman who wanted sterilization. This woman's age multiplied by the number of her children did not exceed 120, making her ineligible for sterilization, according to hospital rules, she said.

NH man beaten by hitchiker

HUBBARDSTON (AP) — A New Hampshire man was reported in stable condition at a hospital yesterday, recovering from a severe beating by an unidentified hitchhiker, who released him after exchanging shots with a vacationing police officer.

State police said Lee D. Boswell, 33, of Londonderry, was hospitalized Wednesday after being beaten about the head, face and hands by a hitchhiker he had picked up along Route 495.

Boswell told police the assailant pointed a gun at him as they were driving onto Route 9 and ordered him to drive to a deserted area nearby.

After tying a jacket around Boswell's head and beating him, the hitchhiker drove off in Boswell's car, officers said.

Boswell freed himself and crawled to a nearby road, where he flagged down a passing motorist, Worcester Patrolman Anthony Butler.

As Butler stopped, the assailant returned, ordered Butler out of his truck and forced Boswell back into his own car at gunpoint, State Police Cpl. Michael Verock said.

Butler pulled a .38-caliber revolver and took cover behind his truck, Verock said. The assailant fired several shots at Butler before speeding away.

Amherst man arrested for indecent exposure

Police arrested a 33 year old Amherst man Wednesday and charged him with indecent exposure and possession of marijuana, after he reportedly exposed himself to a local 13 year old girl, Amherst police said yesterday.

The man, a Market Hill Road resident, was arrested about 3 p.m. Wednesday in the parking lot behind the Archer Kent drug store on North Pleasant Street. Police said he has been charged with three other counts of indecent exposure over the past month involving 13 and 14 year old girls.

A Hampshire County Courthouse official in Northampton said the man was arraigned yesterday on the four counts of indecent exposure and possession of a Class D substance. The official said the suspect entered a not guilty plea, and had his pre-trial conference postponed until Dec. 27.

In their report, UMass police said they have a suspect in an incident Wednesday involving beer bottles being thrown out of a Washington dormitory window. According to police, bottles were being thrown from a window about half way up the tower onto the Southwest mall north of the dorm about 11:45 p.m.

Lebanon, Grenada, East Timor...formula feeding, abortion, prayer; censorship...

There are so many issues we as citizens face today, the question is, what can the individual do to affect the outcome of these matters? The old "tell it to your Congressman" seems time-worn. Problems persist.

The eye-opening of academic experience provides many with increased freedom of expression. For most protesters, their awakening and arousal came when they learned to recognize the need for remedy. The act of learning and the reaction of protest have made collegiates the traditional activists and do-ers. The candle of hope that we carry must be moved carefully, though. Haste and wasteful motions can result in a burn-out.

The power of student-activists can be miraculous, as was shown in the latter days of the Vietnam-sham, but it can also be misdirected. If remedial action is questionable in its effectiveness, the cause may be weakened or deemed unworthy. Concessions granted can mean demands increased. Precedents set can result in unreasonable expectations; from solutions garnered can arise new obstacles in the path to justice.

Divestment of South Africa-related U.S. holdings has been a popular movement on campuses. Notably, Harvard University President Derek Bok has questioned the desirability of divestiture as a means of affecting the Apartheid dilemna.

Saving the Seals is another cause worthy issue that is being treated seriously by activist groups like Greenpeace. Unfortunately, this reputable international non-profit organization has no alternative plan for those who make a living sealing.

The intent of these examples is valid enough; majority populations subdued and helpless seals slaughtered demand attention, and, if possible, effective action.

What about Nicaragua? If you are angry about the blatant U.S. policies of harassment and destruction in that country, what can you do? A group of UMass students, and others, spooked by rumors of American aggression there, picketed a Federal building in Springfield, Mass., to show their concern. Other than alienating a few government employees, the result of this post-election day civil-disobedience was negligible. There is a better way.

We can take a lesson from President Reagan here. Instead of the diplomatic hand-wringing that so characterized the Carter years, Reagan has used direct intervention to some degree of success. Granted, his ends are not always creditworthy, but his methods of accomplishment, his means, have been highly effective.

Effectiveness is what it's all about. Animal lovers can picket the farm til the cows come home, but it's not going to stop the farmer from injecting his stock with ultra-growth chemicals. This can create a dilemma: to press for a better means of protest than pickets and boycotts is inviting fanaticism, and that obviously isn't prudent. Witness the antics of Britain's Animal Liberation Front: firebombing laboratories as a cry against experimentation. In America it has been abortion clinics, mostly in the South, that have been victimized by fanatics.

What we strive for is some common ground between ineffectiveness and fanaticism. There's a lot of room for flexibility in there, and, optimistic as always, I'm beginning to see positive developments.

Just as Oxfam continued it's drive against hunger by correlating student consciousness to money raised, so it can be for the myriad of other causes. Better to organize direct donation drives than to drive people crazy talking about problems.

I've posed a problem for myself by saying so much, but not proposing any solutions, other than suggestions. I am not generally a protester; I will, however, join wholeheartedly in the next cause that offers me a chance to personally affect, in whatever small way possible, the outcome of what I deem an improvable situation.

'We are scared'

Deborah Kutenplon

At the Friends' Meeting for Worship in Minneapolis a woman stood to share her thoughts.

"I have been wondering about the notion of security," she said. "I have been working towards financial security, saving my money so that I can deal with an emergency if I have to.

"But recently I've begun to realize that the emergency is already happening, right now, all around the world, including in American cities. People are starving, children are dying of preventable diseases. What right do I have to stockpile money for my own future financial security when there are millions of people who do not even have the security of their next meal?

"And yet, I save my money still, for I have been taught well."

We are not uncaring people. We hear of famine in Africa and we send what we can afford. It's hard to afford much, what with the cost of college, clothes, and trying to save towards a car. We define our own needs liberally. We need whatever might bring security. And since there is never a point at which we know for sure that we are financially secure, we keep living our lives for that end.

We are not uncaring. We are simply scared. If we do not take care of our own security, no one will do it for us. Yet neither do we help anyone else, for we are too busy and too alone looking out for ourselves.

In our fearfulness, we stockpile, keeping resources (for our possible future use) away from people who need them now. The stockpiles, the savings, make us feel a little more secure, except from the people who now have too little.

The contrast in the realities of different economic worlds is overwhelming. We wonder if we can afford graduate school while they wonder when they might be able to afford another meal. It's enough to make us crazy if we think about it too much. So we don't. It might threaten our security to focus on others too much

At the same Meeting for Worship, another woman told a story about security. She and her daughter vacationed each year in Maine and they liked to leave food on the stumps in the yard for the chipmunks. Each chipmunk claimed a stump, and each got its own food. One summer, though, they noticed that one of the chipmunks was in pretty bad shape, having lost an ear and part of its tail. Feeling sorry for it, they started leaving it more food than the others. From then on, its stump became a fortress, and the poor chipmunk spent all its time defending its extra food from thieves.

Sometimes in trying to increase our security we do just the opposite. So we try to buy it with 10 more Trident II submarines and extra locks on our doors. We try to buy security with stricter punishments for people who react to the injustice in their lives with rage (we call it "senseless violence") or desperation, and turn to crime or drugs as the only way out. We try to buy security by propping up yet another Third World dictatorship, and by buying profitable stock in South Africa. We prioritize finding a well-paying job. And we try not to think about the pictures of starving children.

Not worth paying for

In the wake of the firing of Cliff Myers from the Bluewall, much undue criticism has been leveled at the Collegian Board of Editors and the Board of Governors for their positions on this matter. The criticism has been based on an alleged violation off Myers' right to free speech. This allegation is purely fallacious as no denial of his right to speak has occurred. What in fact has happened is that the positions taken by the aforementioned parties ensured that no student monies will be expended towards the perpetuation of sexist or racist ideologies. Myers' right to free speech has not been denied in this action. Myers is still entitled to voice any opinions on this campus. All that his firing really means is that he will no longer be paid for doing so.

Something's missing...

In reference to the front page article appearing in Monday's Collegian on renovations to the Curry Hicks Cage, I believe the thrust of the renovations is to enlarge the athletic facility. Perhaps he was recalling sharp criticism the plan received last spring, that the expensive plan would not yield an increase in seating capacity. Further as I understand the addition of a ticket office, locker rooms, etc. are only one aspect of the renovations. As stated in the article, major renovations are being performed inside the existing facility. Such as a new floor, track, portable basketball court, ceiling insulation and acoustic material. The Cage arena itself is not being expanded. Which leads me to mention the second false statement in the article which states 4,000 additional seats will be added. As I understand it the Cage use to hold roughly 4,000 and after renovations will still hold roughly the same. In fact last spring as I remember the major controversy toward the Cage renovation plan was that a lot of student money would pay for plan, the renovations were going to be quite expensive (about 2.5 million dollars) and there would be no additional seating capacity. Has the plan changed to suspend people from the ceiling?

Also, the article states there will be a 9,000 square foot addition to the south side of the building. That sounds impressive, but if the building were built square that is also approximately 31.6 by 31.6 yards. Anyway the point is the arena and seat capacity are not expanding and beware of statistics.

I do not oppose the renovation plan or the costs myself. In fact I am glad to see it. I do object to being misinformed. And while I'm at it I also object to spring lacrosse fans that are going to be denied access to the "upper hill" to view men's varsity lacrosse games at Boyden field because of an unnecessary extended construction fence from the Cage. Who planned that fence?

Once again that beastiy monster of finals' anxiety is drooling in the distant horizon. I thought it appropriate to do a special holidays preview column to scare our miseries away. To get you in the proper holiday spirit, I suggest the hilarious A Christmas Story which is re-released at the Hampshire Mall. I went to the matinee show last year and although I was surrounded by a group of runny-nosed brats, the sincerity of the film touched my foreign heart. My favorite part is when this young fellow gets his tongue glued frozen to the telephone pole. The brats and I laughed our heads off.

Goldie Hawn will be gracing the scene this Christmas in a Herbert Ross comedy called Protocol. Goldie plays a cocktail waitress who ends up working at the State Department. Young ladies should be pleased to know that their idol Matt Dillon will be back in another one of those youth-on-vacation-before-entering-real-world movies called The Flamingo Kid. What do people see in this guy?

Speaking of teen idols, Aussie Mel Gibson will be putting on an American accent to save the farm with Sissy Spacek in The River. Mark Rydell of the weepy On Golden Pond fame directs.

Three comedies are coming our way this Christmas. Burt Reynolds, Clint Eastwood, and Jane Alexander are all packaged in City Heat. Dudley Moore and Amy Irving star in Micki and Maude, a film about a man with two wives. Blake Edwards who directed Dudley in 10 collaborates once again. You can catch Michael Keaton and Joe Piscapo in Johnny Dangerously, and Eddie Murphy is back in Beverly Hills Cop. None of the above seem to thrill me. One might just as well stay home and watch Rudolph or Cabbage Patch Christmas Special.

The critics love to rag on poor Francis Ford Coppola. It would be a damn shame if they do it again with The Cotton Club, Coppola's long-awaited film about the roaring twenties. Also, if this work is chopped up by the critics, Diane Lane can kiss her brilliant career good-bye. She was extremely good in A Little Romance. Since then, reviewers haven't really acknowledged her existence. (They were too busy raving about Drew Barrymore!) Lane's starring role against Richard Gere in The Cotton Club should finally give her the attention she deserves. Go for it Diane, and who care about the critics anyway, Mr. Coppola?

Science fiction, anyone? Other than the much hyped about Dune, there are two other fantasy films that I've heard about. 2010 boasts polished special effects and great performances by Roy Scheider and John Lithgow. The sequel to 2001, however, is not as profound as the original. Next week, I will focus on the making of the film along with interviews with the stars and the director.

Starman is another fantasy movie which sounds like E.T. with a love twist. Jeff Bridges is a man from outer space who has a brief romantic interlude with earthling Karen Allen. John Carpenter directs this December release.

Anglophiles will be rejoicing in movie theatres when E.M. Forster's A Passage to India is brought to the screen by the likes of Alec Guiness, Peggy Ashford and Judy Davis. Along the same lines is Mass Appeal, a serious drama with Jack Lemmon, Charles Durning and newcomer Ivanek as an idealistic seminarian.

Two more scoops to stuff your stockings with: The producers of Superman are preparing a Santa movie for next year's Christmas. God forbid if it is anything like their last turkey Supergirl. I had the opportunity to see The Killing Fields last weekend, and beyond a doubt, this must be the masterpiece of the year. Based on Sydney Schanberg's award-winning reporting from Cambodia, the film has an excellent cast including Sam Waterson and John Malkovich. If you see one movie per year, make it The Killing Fields.

Goldie Hawn and Afghan dog smile in Protocol.

Burt Reynolds and Clint Eastwood turn to comedy in City Heat.

Weekend Winners: Proust finally arrives in Northampton with Swann in Love at the Academy of Music. Jeremy Irons and Ornella Mutti drown themselves in a sea of lush sensuality.

Local Loser: Yes, it is here. Paul McCartney's self indulgent musical— millions of dollars wasted on a rich man's egotisical fantasies. Give My Regards to Broad Street deserves no regards. Paul, stick to making videos with Michael Jackson, O.K.? Don't forget to read Chris Marini's explicit interview with Paul McCartney in Monday's Collegian.

Killer Question: This Christmas, Karen Allen has a brief affair with an alien. This is her second film fling of the year. What was her first (September release)? The prizes: a beautiful press kit for Micki and Maude, and the December issues of Omni and American Film, which do wonders for procrastinators. Come by the Collegian for the great giveaways. Good luck with the dreaded finals.

House Negro

By CHRISTOPHER WILLIAMS

Just like the big House Negro today's bourgeois Negro is good.
He loved masta and now he loves the pinstriped cracker.
Grinning and skinning and full of self hate, the bourgeoise and houseslave put on their mask.
They grin while they experience pain because one does not want the tables turned, "Oh, no."
Pain from the self-hate and the furious lash. Pain from not having enough cash and looking brash.
Both the House Negro and bourgeois Negro think that they've made it.
From field to palace in the sky
what fools they are; you haven't made it till your minds have made it...
Both the bourgeois and House Negro hate themselves, they want equality, yet they still think subconsciously that they are inferior.
Meanwhile, they date and marry substitutes of Africaness because they would hate to wake up to somebody as Black and toughheaded as themselves.
Look at some of our leaders, they give lip service, but yet drool at the lips for what they say is the enemy.
So they marry light instead of white.
Light skin is praised, as they Jerri their hair and pray to be fair while they pray to their Jesus in Sweden
They have their degrees and yet know nothing of the Queens of the Nile;
Oh, but that's not important, we've made it.
From field to house from ghetto to palace in the sky
They search, pray, and look to their own oppressors for help while the solution to their problem is within them.
Get up off you knees negra, nigger, coon, negro, colored and be proud
African Men.
Get up off your knees negresses,
nigresses,
coonesses, colored women and be proud
African Women.
Use what you have as proud people and develop your mind.
If you hate yourself you cannot expect you enemy to love you.
People do not respect people who are not proud;
then when you have done this you would have killed one of your enemies.

Forum discusses problem

By YADIRA A. BETANCES
Collegian Staff

The importance of the Collegian's making a serious commitment to overcoming a racist past in order to recruit and keep members of the Third World was discussed last night at the Collegian forum on Third World issues.

The forum was an informal discussion of Third World issues at the Collegian between various staff members and people from the Third World community and the Affirmative Action Office.

The Collegian should make a stronger commitment to recruit and retain Third World students in the paper once they decide to join the staff, the forum concluded.

Having paid positions to attract Third World students, holding awareness workshops on racism and other isms and making a public commitment to erase these problems would improve the relationship.

The Collegian's Board of Editors has made it mandatory for students who want to become staff members to attend awareness workshops, but the question of what to do with staff members who continually promulgate racist and sexist attitudes in the newsroom and in the context of the paper was heavily discussed.

Dismissing the person was suggested, but the issue of the First Amendment was noted. Ron Sinacori of the Affirmative Action Office said the editors have to establish a border line on what is to be tolerated. There must be a responsibility on good taste and moral justice, he said.

At present, the Collegian Constitution does not include any punishment for racist or sexist incidents, but editors are interested in amending this part of the constitution.

James P. Shanahan, editor in chief, found the forum to be good and informative. He said it did not only bring out concerns of the Third World community, but also showed the Collegian's weaknesses on Third World issues.

"It is not only important that we improve our image in the Third World community, but we must also strive for an improved atmosphere in the newsroom," he said.

He said tougher demands on newsroom behavior and amending the constitution, as well as other issues aired at the forum, will be addressed in the future.

Fundraiser to help Ethiopia

By KIMBERLY BURGE
Collegian Staff

The Hunger Task Force and the Hunger Awareness Committee will sponsor a fundraiser to help raise monies for the famine victims in Ethiopia at the Campus Center concourse next week at the University of Massachusetts.

A table will be set up on the concouse where students will be able to obtain information about Ethiopia. Donation canisters will be distributed throughout the campus so that people will be able to give money towards the cause.

The film "Seeds of Despair" which depicts the harsh reality and the vicitms of the famine will also be shown in an effort to raise people's awareness about the hunger problem in Ethiopia.

According to Sherwood Thompson, director of the Office of Third World Affairs, "The money raised will be given to the International Red Cross. They will use it to buy grains, cereals, powdered milk, medical supplies, trucks, four-wheel drive vehicles, helicopters to airlift supplies, and trained medical personnel."

He's pleased with the way Americans have responded to the plight of the Ethiopian people. "Given that it's a gigantic problem, there has been a generous response to Ethiopia."

Kakoli Baerjee, a member of the Hunger Task Force, is also pleased with America's response. "The U.S. citizens have been wonderful. However, the government has been slow to respond."

Banerjee added the famine is not an overnight problem, but a problem plaguing Ethiopia since the early seventies. "I find the Western World unsympathetic toward the plight of these people," she said. Baerjee suggests "More international aid has to be given."

Ethiopian's famine is threatening the lives of six million people. But this disaster is not only limited to Ethiopia. In the Sub-Saharan region while the population grows about 2.5 percent a year, the amount of food produced annually, according to World Bank figures, grows by only one percent.

The Hunger Task Force and the Hunger Awareness Committee are looking for volunteers to man tables, put up posters, present information to the residential areas and to the community. If you're interested, please contact the Office of Third World Affairs.

WASHINGTON, PROTEST ARREST — Uniformed officers remove Rep. Ronald Dellums, D-Calif., from the South African Embassy in Washington Wednesday, following his arrest in a protest against the racial policies of that nation's white rulers. Dellums and two others were charged with a misdemeanor for failing to remain at least 500 feet away from the embassy grounds. They refused to leave the front steps after being denied a meeting with the ambassador.

Then get in on the ground floor in our undergraduate officer commissioning program. You could start planning on a career like the men in this ad have. And also have some great advantages like:

- Earning $1000 a month during the school year.
- As a freshman or sophomore, you could complete your basic training during two six-week summer sessions and earn more than $1100 during each session.
- Juniors earn more than $2000 during one eight-week summer session.
- You can take free civilian flight lessons.
- You're commissioned upon graduation.

If you're looking to move up quickly, look into the Marine Corps undergraduate officer commissioning program. You could start off making more than $15,000 a year.

We're looking for a few good men.

Want to move up quickly?

Minutemen fall to powerful Florida

Lose second straight, 67-51

By ROGER CHAPMAN
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team went into last night's game facing a University of Florida team that had arrived in Amherst at 2 a.m. yesterday morning. However, fatigue didn't affect the Lady Gators as Florida overcame a slow start and ran away with a 67-51 victory before 284 at Amherst College.

The Minutemen got off to a quick start, scoring the first six points of the game behind a Juanita Matthews fast break layup and a Karen Damminger inside move. But Florida responded with a six point run of their own behind the inside power of 6-3 junior forward Keturah Bell.

UMass stayed close for the next three minutes, but the Lady Gators opened up the game with a 16-3 spurt that took the sting out of the UMass offense.

"We had a lot of problems offensively," said coach Barbara Stevens. "Their intense pressure defense clogged up the passing lanes and we were not able to get off many good shots."

Add to that fact that the Minutemen had another dismal shooting performance from the floor (30 percent), and committed 25 turnovers and you have a good way to keep yourself out of a game.

"You can't commit as many turnovers as we did and expect to stay in the game," said Stevens. "We just didn't take out time and that resulted in some rushed passes and mishandled balls."

"Our defense is designed to deny the ball and prevent the open shot," said Florida head coach Debbie Yow. "UMass is an excellent shooting team from the perimeter. We just tried to make sure they were off balance on some of their shots."

UMass only trailed by 11 at the half, thanks to their own aggressive defense and outside shooting from Barbara Hebel.

"I think we played pretty well defensively," said Stevens. "We tried to keep the ball from Tammy Jackson (UF's three-time All-SEC selection) but they had a very strong, very quick front line."

The second half saw both teams play relatively even, with buckets being exchanged up and down the floor. But again, the difference was turnovers, as the Minutemen lost several opportunities to whittle away at the Florida lead.

"We took ourselves out of the game with the turnovers," said Stevens. "Right now it's a matter of both time and discipline."

Damminger led all scorers with 16 points and hauled in a game high 12 rebounds.

Junior point guard Juanita Matthews puts up a foul line jumper as teammate Karen Damminger waits in the lane for one of her 12 rebounds in last night's 67-51 loss to Florida at Amherst College.

Hebel chipped in 15 points and Rebecca Kucks came off the bench to add 8 points.

Florida was led by Bell and Susan Stoddard, who each tossed in 12 points. Margaret Peters added 10 points.

"We rebounded pretty well," said Stevens. "We were a bit intimidated by their size (Florida's front line went 6-1, 6-3, and 6-3 across the floor). They really didn't out play us, when you consider the size."

UMass basketball coach Ron Gerlufsen and the Minutemen head to UNH on Saturday.

Minutemen search for the right touch at UNH

Gerlufsen wants better outside shooting

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

The offensive game plan of any college basketball team includes good outside shooting. When a team has no real center to go inside to, as is the case with the University of Massachusetts, that need takes on greater importance.

So it is hardly surprising that UMass coach Ron Gerlufsen will be looking for better production from his perimeter shooters when the Minutemen travel to the University of New Hampshire on Saturday for a 2 p.m. game.

UMass, 1-0 after a 71-69 defeat of Stonehill on Monday, will face a defensive-minded UNH team that employs a lot of zone defenses, sets that call for good outside shooting to break them.

"We'll have to shoot well in the 15 to 18 foot range to beat them," Gerlufsen said. "I know we can, we just didn't show it against Stonehill."

UMass' guards (and main perimeter shooters) Carl Smith, Donald Russell, Darryl Carter, Lorenzo Sutton, Matt Ryan and forward Ron Young, went a combined 14-for-33 from the floor against Stonehill, only 42 percent.

"Maybe it was jitters because it was our first game or maybe it was playing in a new gym (Springfield Civic Center), I don't know," Gerlufsen said. "It just has to improve and I think it will."

UNH, 0-1, was crushed by Boston College 86-63 in its opener but will give the Minutemen more trouble than that score indicates.

UMass hasn't won in Durham since 1979 and needed a last second layup by Smith to defeat the Wildcats 75-73 last year at Curry Hicks Cage.

UNH went 15-13 last year and returns Rodney Johnson (14 against BC and 8.2 points per game last season) and Dirk Koopman (11 against BC). Freshman James Best had 14 against the Eagles.

"It's a rivalry with us and UConn and other New England schools they play," Gerlufsen said. "They always play us tough and this game is a good indicator of how good we are this season."

One player Gerlufsen already knows is good is senior forward Horace Neysmith.

The 6-6 co-captain scored 20 points, had 12 rebounds, four assists and three steals in 39 minutes against Stonehill. Smith added 12 and Young 10 points.

Neysmith, Bobby Braun and Young will start in the frontcourt in UM's three forward set-up with Smith and Russell at the guards. Freshman Lorenzo Sutton, three points in 17 minutes against Stonehill, will be the first player off the bench.

Collegian's NFL Picks

With the season having only three weeks remaining Scott Hood clings to a three game lead after a fine 7-6 week. The often-opinionated Rita Murphy, filling in for the fired Kevin DeLuca, also went 7-6. Nancy "I'm in the swim" Bukar steps in for DeLuca this week. As for the hapless deSimas...

Lack of women faculty revealed

BY DEBORAH ROSS
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts publicly claims to be an affirmative action, "equal opportunity employer," but this claim is thrown into question by the statistical profile of women faculty members at UMass released by the personnel office.

The following, based on a Fall 1983 census date, represent the major findings:

- Although UMass has 1,214 faculty members, only 200 of these positions are filled by women. That is, 83.5 percent of all faculty members are male.
- Although UMass has 896 tenured faculty members, only 104 of these positions are filled by women, That is, 89 percent of all tenured faulty members are male.
- Although UMass has 585 professors, only 46 of these positions are filled by women. That is, 92 percent of all professors are male.
- The average annual salary of a male faculty member is $34,767 compared to $28,913 for a woman. That is, women earn 17 percent less than their male counterparts.

Barabara Love, associate professor of education, describes women faculty at UMass as 'under-represented, under-employed and under-paid," and associate professor of English, Arlyn Diamond, said "it is always a shock to look at these figures."

Sylvia Forman, an associate professor and department chairwoman, described the figures as "sad" and added that what she found distressing was not so much "the figures, but that they haven't changed much over the entire century."

UMass grants land to mental health housing

By LAURA YEE
Collegian Staff

Two one-acre sites of University of Massachusetts property will be given to the state's Department of Mental Health to build housing for the handicapped upon approval by the Board of Trustees later this week.

The Campus Physical Planning Committee examined four sites and recommended one on North Pleasant Street next to the Lutheran Immanuel Church and the other on Fairfield Street, where the end of the road abuts University property.

Costs and the exact type of patients that will be housed has not yet been determined but the state will be responsible for all funding and maintenance.

Although the proposal of the land grant passed the faculty senate last Thursday, the council's announcement drew fierce response from professors concerned about the safety of residents surrounding the suggested sites. Some also predicted that the Legislature might request more property in the future.

Irving Rothberg, a professor of Spanish and Portuguese feared the safety of the children at the Marks Meadow School, which is near the proposed North Pleasant Street site.

But David Booth, political science professor and chairman of the council said "the patients will not be a threat. Most or all of the patients will either be in wheelchairs" or will continually be accompanied by an escort.

Irving Howards, a political science professor said he would support the proposal, but said it made him "a bit nervous." He said the presence of the patients "will have a major impact on the town of Amherst."

Martin Norden, a Communication Studies professor asked, "how far will the state go" in obtaining land and Harry Schumer, a psychology professor added, "there's a whole host of unanswered questions. What about future planning?" Schumer asked.

Booth said the facility would be "residential in character" similar to "suburban houses." The patients "will be properly looked after," Booth added.

Doris Chaves, an associate professor of the Division of Nursing in the Department of Public Health was "appalled that this senate has any questions about the building" of the facility.

"Our responsibility to the Commonwealth goes beyond educating undergraduate and graduate students," Booth said.

Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey said he was eager to cooperate with Gov. Michael S. Dukakis' office since it will later help UMass with budget requests from the state's Legislature.

"The state decided that the University is a community where handicapped adults in limited capacity can live and work," Duffey said. The facilities would house "long term residents," not those who are "mentally ill."

Mass waters are 'critical' says report results

By TOM MIDDLETON
Collegian Staff

About five percent of the lakes, ponds and streams tested by University of Massachusetts researchers are "completely acidified" and pose a threat to fish and other aquatic life, as well as humans.

Results from the Acid Rain Monitoring Project's October study based at UMass show that 126 of the 2,532 water bodies tested are acidified and threaten water life. "It can be a human health concern in areas where drinking water flows through metal distribution pipes containing lead or other toxic metals," the report stated.

The report also stated that 253 of the water bodies tested are in "critical" condition, while 1,772, or 70 percent, are "sensitive to acidification at some level."

The project recently released the results of its October study which state that Barnstable, Bristol, Dukes and Plymouth counties in southeastern Massachusetts, have the most acid sensitive surface waters.

"It is somewhat surprising because these results should have been the best of the year," the project's statewide coordinator Armand Ruby said. "It could become a crisis if acidification continues for five to 10 years," he said.

The October study, representing the best water conditions of the year, will be added to the findings of the project's April study which will represent the worst water conditions of the year because of snow melting and heavy rains in the spring.

"We do expect things will look worse in April," Ruby said.

The April study will conclude the second phase of the project and will give researchers a complete inventory of the chemical condition of the state's surface freshwater. During October 1983, and last April, 1,229 water bodies were tested in the first phase of the project.

Academy of Sciences, industrial air pollutants from coal-burning power plants in the Midwest are carried by easterly weather patterns. When it rains or snows, the pollutants are carried into lakes, streams and other water bodies.

Acid rain is blamed for what is believed to be a growing acid build up in water bodies of the Northeast.

"The data has been quite widely used, it was used by the National Governors Association," Ruby said. "It's politically hot information," he said.

The study involved more than 800 volunteers statewide collecting water samples and 23 laboratories, including the University. The samples are at UMass' chemistry department where the presence of certain metallic and non-metallic elements will be tested.

About 35 UMass student volunteers helped in the primary testing at UMass.

Madrigal dinner evokes medieval times of olde for Christmas diners

By MICHELLE SEGALL
Collegian Staff

The setting is Christmas Eve, 1591, and a massive yuletide celebration begins with a myriad of food, song and merriment.

But at the Campus Center Auditorium, it is still December 1984 at the 14th annual Madrigal Dinner, a medieval banquet complete with roasted boar's heads, a court jester, madrigal music and ornate costumes.

The celebration is being hosted this week by the University Madrigal Singers and Campus Center Food Services.

From the trumpets heralding the guests' arrival to the steaming wassail bowl, each evening's festivities are "in the flavor of the times," according to Wayne Abercrombie, director of the Madrigal Singers.

Members of the University Madrigal Singers make a toast as the procession of the comestibles add holiday cheer to the celebration of Christmas 1591 style.

Abercrombie, who has directed the singers for 11 years, said the dinners have grown from a simple one or two nights of 16th century celebration to "an elaborate evening's entertainment." Most of the dinners are already sold out, and are being held Tuesday through Thursday nights.

Bill Moulton, a music teacher at Greenfield High School, who brought his chorus class of 26 students on the opening night of the celebration last Thursday said, "It's an excellent learning experience to hear period music done in the style of the period."

State education bill proposes 'radical' reforms

BOSTON (AP) — The Massachusetts Board of Education, meeting in emergency session on the weekend, opposed early teacher retirement and a number of other proposals in an education reform bill now before the Legislature.

But the board declared it "supports the reform of public elementary and secondary education in Massachusetts and therefore broadly supports House Bill 6262," a spokesman said.

The board supported the spirit of the bill 10-2 with two members absent, said spokesman Terry Zoulas.

The reform bill, which is awaiting a final House vote before going to the state Senate, calls for the most radical reform of state education since the early 1960s, Zoulas said.

Among other things, the bill would set statewide teaching and basic education standards for the first time, compare the test results of students from different districts for the first time and boost per-pupil aid in districts that spend the least on their students.

The board also supported two amended proposals setting starting teacher salaries at $18,000 and making a mandatory class size, but giving the board the power to waive class sizes in districts that are unable to meet the requirement.

Sri Lanka violence continues; 169 dead

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka (AP) — The government reported that 169 people had been killed in three days, 11 of them in Tamil rebel attacks yesterday on two fishing villages, and said the separatist guerrillas are "bent on creating communal violence countrywide."

Sri Lanka destroyed six boats carrying suspected Tamil invaders from India and its troops skirmished with an estimated 100 guerrillas Sunday night on Talaimannar pier, which faces southern India, sources in Colombo said.

No details were available and the sources spoke on condition of not being identified, but one official source said there was a strong deployment of both troops and police in the area in response to rebel land attack. There were no casualty reports from the boat sinkings or the pier fray.

Three children, one an infant, were among those killed at the fishing villages, authorities said. Fisheries Minister Festus Perera said survivors told him that 14 or 15 guerrillas with bombs and guns attacked the villages of Nyaru and Kokkilai early Sunday.

The rebels want a separate Tamil state in northern Sri Lanka, where Tamils are in the majority. Militant leaders among the Tamils, a Hindu sect making up about 16 percent of Sri Lanka's population of 17 million, claim Tamils are victims of discrimination by the majority Sinhalese, who are Buddhists.

The government last week imposed a night curfew for much of the country. In Colombo, the capital, National Security Minister Lalith Athulthmudali said the "terrorists" hope their attacks on citizens will trigger attacks by Sinhalese on Tamils and street fighting throughout the country.

"They are bent on creating communal violence countrywide. What they want to do is to provoke a backlash of communal violence against the Tamils living in the south so that troops will have to be withdrawn from the north to maintain law and order. Then the north will be clear for them to declare their separate state," the Minister said.

The government claims the guerrillas are being trained in the southern India state of Tamil Nadu and are planning to invade Sri Lanka. India during the weekend denied that Tamil guerrillas were training in India.

The government said at least 148 people were killed Friday in guerrilla attacks on two prison farms in the north. The government said the victims included 80 guards, prisoners and their families, and 68 rebels who died in subsequent battles with troops.

Teachers in Chicago threaten to strike 3rd largest school district

CHICAGO (AP) — Negotiations broke off yesterday between teachers and school officials in the nation's third-largest school district, threatening a midnight strike that would idle 430,000 students and up to 40,000 employees.

"We will be striking," Chicago Teachers Union spokesman Chuck Burdeen said as he left board headquarters at 6:40 a.m., after all-night talks ended.

The announcement on the breakdown in talks came despite a board offer that satisfied one of the union's most pressing demands, on medical insurance. Other major issues in the dispute are pay and the school board's cost-cutting plans.

A strike would idle 28,000 teachers, and 12,000 non-teaching school employees planned to honor picket lines.

The union's House of Delegates was to met late yesterday to finish up details of the strike, Burdeen said.

Right-wing group against equal pay

WASHINGTON (AP) — An influential conservative organization is urging the Reagan administration to launch "a top priority" battle against the comparable worth theory of achieving pay equity for women.

The Heritage Foundation, a private think-tank which has been a font of ideas for the administration, argues that the controversial idea "would lead to a flood of litigation, massive wage redistribution, a distortion of free market principles and, ultimately, widespread job dislocation."

Advocates of the theory argue that sex descrimination has held down salaries in jobs mostly occupied by women, like secretarial positions, while male-dominated jobs requiting comparable "knowledge, skill and judgment" receive higher pay.

Heritage's rebuttal on what it called "the most significant employment discrimination issue of 1984" was included among a score of recommendations in the Justice Department chapter of "Mandate for Leadership II: Continuing the Conservative Revolution."

"Mandate II," due out Dec 7, is a 600-page sequel to the foundation's 1980 report, "Mandate for Leadership: Policy Management in a Conservative Administration." More than 60 percent of the first document's proposals were acted on during Reagan's first year.

This time, the foundation may find its most receptive audience at Justice, because Reagan plans to renominate his counselor Edwin Meese III to replace William French Smith as attorney general. And Meese, a longtime Heritage backer, in 1980 and again last month personally distributed the Heritage recommendations to Reagan and his Cabinet.

Among other proposals, Heritage urges the Justice Department to:

• Resurrect an order requiring more than 100,000 federal officials to submit to advance government censorship of their writings and speeches for life.

Issued by Reagan as National Security Decision Directive 84, the order was suspended in the face of congressional opposition and after its author, acting Assistant Attorney General Richard Willard, acknowledged only a few former officials have ever disclosed government secrets.

Grenada will hold elections today; US 'officially neutral'

ST. GEORGE'S, Grenada (AP) — Grenadians vote Monday in a return to democracy that the United States and its Caribbean allies hope will not backfire.

The United States is officially neutral in the race for 15 seats in the British-style Parliament, but its obvious preference to win Grenada's first election since 1976 is 66-year-old moderate Herbert Blaize.

The 1976 election was followed by a 1979 leftist coup, a bloody power struggle that resulted in an army takeoever and the slaying of leftist Prime Minister Maurice Bishop on Oct. 19, 1983. Six days later, there was a U.S.-led invasion of the tiny, spice-producing nation.

Opposing Blaize's New National Party are the leftist Maurice Bishop Patriotic Movement and the Grenada, United Labor Party led by Sir Eric Gairy, winner of seven of the eight elections in Grenada's history.

Gairy—who headed the colonial struggle for workers rights and independence—became known internationally because of government corruption, the use of strongarm tactics against his leftist foes, and his beliefs in mysticism and unidentified flying objects.

More Cubans to US, change in Florida is seen

MIAMI (AP) — About 125,000 Cubans who fled their homeland in the 1980 "freedom flotilla" boatlift can apply for U.S. residency beginning today, and officials say they may eventually bring in more than 300,000 relatives who were left behind.

The refugees and their families could change the face of culture and politics in southern Florida, where most are expected to settle.

"A vast majority of the people want to bring relatives from Cuba," said Juan Clark, a sociology professor at Miami-Dade Community College who last spring surveyed 514 randomly selected refugees here.

The Cubans came to Florida during the boatlift from the port of Mariel from April 15 to Oct. 15, 1980, after Cuban President Fidel Castro expressed his indifference to their leaving. They have since lived in a legal limbo, unable to bring their relatives here.

But as of today, the "Marielitos" can apply with the Immigration and Naturalization Service for residency under the Cuban Adjustment Act of 1966, which allowed Cubans who fled their country's communist revolution in the 1950s to eventually seek citizenship in the United States.

The recent immigrants had earlier been barred from filing under the 1966 act because Congress had hoped to pass new immigration laws. But the failure to pass such legislation prompted the Reagan administration to let them apply under the adjustment act after all.

Combat forms of harassment, says lecturer

By JEANETTE DeFORGE
Collegian Staff

Awareness of women's issues in the classroom is required to combat the mild forms of harassment common at colleges, Eve Sedgwick, an associate professor of English at Amherst College told a small audience in Converse Hall Thursday night.

"It (harassment) is not only in the form of 'sex for an A,'" said Eve Sedgwick in a lecture titled "Gender Pride and Gender Prejudice." "It can also be found in a class structured toward men where a male professor shows less respect for a women's intellect, "just because she is a woman," she said.

According to a Harvard University study, many women feel uncomfortable enough to switch out of a class because of a male professor or choose not to take a course because of harassment problems, Sedgwick said.

There is a problem of double binds for women. If a woman becomes a feminist, she runs the risk of being called a lesbian, she said.

"(Everybody) must work to create a non-homophobic feeling on campus," Sedgwick said. "The fact that there are less than a dozen homosexuals at Amherst College who are '"out of the closet,' shows a lack of trust."

"Getting rid of homophobia means getting rid of many double biases for women," she said.

"There is pressure on women to underachieive, they are afraid to speak out in mixed company," Sedgwick said. Women are afraid of failure; if there are three women in a math class the women feel they must represent their gender, she said.

Women must work for sexual harassment policies to get recognized as women and as equal people, Sedgwick said.

Dickinson house site of burglary of antiques

A Simon Willard brass banjo clock belonging to the Dickinson family was stolen from the Emily Dickinson Hall on 280 Main St. Wednesday night.

The clock, which dated back to the early 19th century, was on loan from Harvard University's Dickinson Homestead Collection, police said.

Also reported missing were silverware and two antique clocks, a bracket clock made by Webster of London and an Ell Terry pillar and scroll clock, police said. Both of the clocks are more than 200 years old.

The curator of the house discovered the burgulary Thursday morning around 10 o'clock.

Police said the burglar entered the house during the night by prying open a first floor rear window and left through the kitchen door. The curator was home, asleep at the time.

Little change one year after Crampton fires

Officials voice opinions

By GREG BROWN
Collegian Staff

On Dec. 2, 1983, a Crampton resident assistant was arrested and charged with setting one of 16 suspicious fires set in that dorm.

A year later, University of Massachusetts officials said they have not seen significant changes on campus resulting from the series of small paper fires which drew national media attention.

Many administrators, however, were hesitant to speak because of the $13 million lawsuit filed last May by Yvette I. Henry, then a 20-year-old chemistry major, after the charges against her were dropped in December for lack of evidence.

Named in the lawsuit are Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey, Dean of Students William F. Field, Public Safety Director Gerald T. O'Neil, Housing Services Director Joseph A. Zannini, and numerous University administrators and state law enforcement officials.

Field declined to comment.

I "never felt that this was something that could be solved by harsher security,"—Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey

O'Neil said there is "no active investigation being conducted."

Duffey said, "The most significant result of the fires is the awareness of students in the dormitories that such a situation cannot continue."

"People now feel there's nothing funny about it, that there's a high risk," he said.

Duffey said he "never felt that this was something that could be solved by harsher security." Both he and O'Neil said security at the Amherst campus has not changed because of the fires, and would not be in the future. Henry and Charles DiMare, her attorney from the Legal Services Office, were not available for comment.

Professor John Brigham, the chairman of the University Discipline Board, said he believed that arson crisis was directly related to the current revisions being made on the student code of conduct.

"If those people who are responsible for last year think they need a clearer code, they should make it clearer," he said.

One of Henry's attorneys, Harry L. Miles of Amherst, said the litigation for civil right violations including false arrest, is "in a discovery process. We are taking testimony to discover who was responsible for what," he said.

The trial will be held in U.S. District Court in "a couple of years," Miles said.

Potential millionaires train with Investment Club $3,000

By LAURA KENDRICK
Collegian Correspondent

The University's Investment Club, with 60 members, controls $3,000 worth of assets which they invest "for educational purposes," according to club's chairman Steven Kohl.

The "Aurora Partners," the self-proclaimed University Investment Club is a group of potential and present entrepreneurs, who pool their funds and resources to gain experience by buying and selling stock.

Kohl said, "We give students an opportunity to invest now, and apply this knowledge in the future. This research is part of the learning process of our members."

The "Aurora Partners" have never had the approval of the Student Government Association, Kohl said. The SGA ruled against the club's recognition because the individual members gain profits which are not shared with the University. Kohl said the club's current assets are about $3,000. The club also has a money market account with profits distributed equally among "shareholders." The club asks $3.00 per semester and $5.00 a month for a member to be given active status. Once the member is active, an acceptance of two-thirds majority is needed to approve the investment of a particular stock introduced by the club's "Investment Research Committee". This investment is not always at an equal vote since one dollar equals one vote. Those members with more money invested in the group would then have the majority.

The past members boast of their exposure from the organization. Former Chairman Leo Saraceno, joined the Sheraton Corporation in a management trainee program. Jay Dwight, one of the seven original partners is a broker in Portland, Maine.

No drought relief for Tigre

Few deliveries to guerilla-occupied areas

BOSTON AP — Only a few trucks carrying food, medicine and other supplies provided by Western relief agencies are reaching the drought-afflicted province of Tigre in northwestern Ethiopia, where as many as 3 million people face starvation, a newspaper reported yesterday.

The trucks, based in the Sudan, roll under cover of darkness and in defiance of Ethiopia's Marxist military government, which has been either unwilling or unable to channel food relief into rebel-controlled areas of the country, the Boston Globe reported.

Liberation Front guerrillas occupy at least 80 percent of the province.

"If the back door is the only way we can reach these people, then the back door it will be," one relief agency field worker in Tigre told the Globe.

Although a massive international relief effort has brought hundreds of thousands of tons of food into famine-stricken Ethipia over the past two months, almost none of it is reaching Tigre, where an estimated 12,000 people a week are dying of hunger.

"What is happening in Tigre represents a failure not only of the Ethiopian overnment but of the international relief community," said Chris Cartter of the relief agency Grassroots International, which is based in Cambridge, Mass.

★Madrigal dinner

Throughout the dinner, the singers entertain with a wide variety of music and dialogue from the 16th century. During the meal, Jester Susan Kirby captivated the crowd with her juggling feats.

After the wassail was served, the singers wandered up and down the aisles serenading the crowd. For the finale, the audience joined the singers for "Silent Night."

Although the crowd is varied, not many UMass students go to the dinners. Most of the people who attend are members of social groups or University alumni who traditionally attend.

Since Food Services has a mailing list of 3,000 for the event, most of the dinners are sold out, Bill Whittemore, catering coordinator said. "We sold out within the first week of sales," Whittemore said about this year's dinners.

The Campus Center Auditorium seats 416 for each dinner, Whittemore said. Tickets are still available for the evenings of Dec. 5 and 6, and can be purchased in the Campus Center Hotel's Catering Office on the third floor of the CC. Tickets are $12 for students and $15 for the general public.

Hiring procedures difficult to regulate for discrimination

♀WOMEN IN FACULTY♂

By DEBORAH ROSS
Collegian Staff

Editors note: This story is the first in a five part series that examines the status of women faculty at UMass. The introduction to the series appeared on page one.

Discriminatroy practices taking place at the hiring level are difficult to both locate and counteract because the responsibility for hiring rests with the members of a department rather than a single individual, according to most faculty members and administrators interviewed.

Anthropology professor, Sylvia Forman described the hiring procedure in the anthropology department which is substantially the same for all departments across campus although "some of the details may differ," she said.

The procedure may be summarized as follows:

—The faculty members of a department decide what specialty area they wish a new faculty member to be familiar with and then place advertisements and announcements in a variety of places.

—The merits of each applicant are accessed and the references of candidates considered worthy are sent for.

—Depending on these, the list is reduced again and the candidates are rank ordered.

—The candidates are then invited to be interviewed by the faculty, to give a lecture and to meet the dean.

—The faculty re-rank members rank the candidates and the job is offered.

—The final approval is given by the dean and the chancellor is required to sign the final papers.

Most faculty members interviewed agreed with Forman's observation that while "pre-calculated discrimination is infrequent" within the hiring process, it easily allows unintentional prejudices against women to come into play.

"Because most faculty members are men," said Education Professor Barbara Love "you've got certain sets of assumptions built into departments about women," which are capable of affecting their chances of being hired.

James Boylan, Journalism professor and head of the Massachusetts Society of Professors agrees that a "department which has a male majority can act on traditional assumptions about women." Said one such assumption is that "women are looked on as not fit for positions of authority" and as such "women qualified for leadership positions just don't get them."

According to history Professor Joyce Berkman, faculties are too concerned with a candidate's credentials," such as amount of published work and research, and this inadvertently discriminates against women.

"If you consider entry-level candidates" she said "you will invariably find that men's surface credentials are better than women's."

This is because men "do not have to juggle the extra responsibilities of home and family" and also because a credential orientation is "fostered very early in male intellectual development," she said.

Whereas "male graduate students ask themselves what they have to do to get a good job after their Ph.D," Berkman said, "women graduate students are more intellectually exploratory."

Berkman suggests that what is required is "a much more open, pluralistic, definition of professional performance."

Chancellor Duffey believes discrimination within the faculty hiring system is difficult to locate and rectify because "there is always a problem of accountability when groups of people do hirings." According to Duffey, the only answer would be to have the responsibility for hiring "taken out of the faculty arena."

★women in faculty

Joyce Berkman, associate professor of history, describes the situation of women faculty as "horrible," but added that "some of the situation is due to historical factors."

Journalism professor and head of the Massachusetts Society of Professors, James Boylan, agreed that part of the reason is historical especially since "the University went into a period of retrenchment in 1974 and only emergency hiring of faculty was allowed," but he also said "the recent record of hiring at the University is not very satisfactory."

According to Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey, women faculty fail to be substantially represented because "it is only relatively recent that women have found doors open to them, and have found encouragement to take up graduate studies and careers."

But beyond "seeing the result of a late opening of opportunities," Duffey also said there are "a whole host of other reasons." In particular, he cited the problem of "the barriers that are still there, some conscious and some unconscious" which exists "inside peoples heads in certain assumptions and attitudes they have" about women.

Berkman agrees that, historical factors aside, some of the problem arises from "if not active, then passive discrimination."

One place where such discrimination may be occurring is in the hiring procedure for faculty positions.

"But not everybody does so" she said. For example, although departments are meant to conduct a full and thorough search for candidates to fill a position some may "conduct their own funny little searches" she said, such as "just advertising in trade journals" which are read more by males than by females.

In such cases the Office of Affirmative Action will report to the dean of the relevant faculty the "hiring is flawed" and the Dean's responsibility is to either halt the hiring process or contest the argument with the Chancellor.

Duffey agrees that "deans should be held accountable" but he would not raise "intervention above that" by assuming a more prominent role in the hiring process himself.

Is this free speech?

Free speech? I'd like to discuss it. People are missing something very important when they talk about free speech. No one ever considers other people's rights when they go on about the subject. Sure, we can say what we want, but what about when it offends a race of people? Aren't we infringing upon their civil rights? As you probably have guessed, I am referring to "comedian" Cliff Meyer.

People do not realize that racist, sexist, classist, anti-semitic and homophobic comedians, television shows, jokes, etc. perpetuate stereotypes and closed minded thinking. Believe it or not, there is a lot of this going on at this liberal institution of ours.

Here's a good example. My housemate Mark Caldeira exercized his right to free speech in a column titled "Gotta Love Those 'Radicals'" (Nov. 26). I must admit, I did not agree with all that article had to say, but I do not condemn him for saying what he wanted.

Some people are condemning him for his free speech. As a matter of fact, he received two threatening phone calls. One said that if he wrote any more columns, our house would be blown up with plastic explosives(!).

Threats! Where is your "free speech" now, people? Is there really such a thing? We must have tolerance! Just because someone's political views are different than yours, do you have to threaten them? There is no absolute right or wrong in politics, although many think their views are "politically correct."

A threat to Caldeira is a threat to me, and our other housemates, also. To his callers—are you going to threaten me, now? We are not living under fascism; we are living under democracy, or are we?

Please people—start practicing what you preach!

Appreciating beauty

I am writing in response to Rebecca Thatcher's column Thursday condemning the Miss Massachusetts pageant and beauty pageants in general. Her point is a reminder of the old wisdom that you can't judge a book by the cover.

I agree with this assertion; it is clearly unfair, as well as hasty and misleading, to judge a woman's character by her looks, or, by the old analogy, to judge a book's content by its cover. I wish to continue this analogy with a question: what about those who wish to appreciate the book's cover for its own merits? Since the invention of writing, artisans have been creating covers and bindings that are beautiful and valuable works of art in and of themselves, having a worth completely independent of the quality of the text within. Conversely, many of the world's greatest works of literature are published in plain and simple paperback bindings which in no way reflect the richness of the book.

Now, to restate my question: what is so wrong in appreciating a woman's physical beauty solely for beauty's own sake? The artisitic study of the human form, both male and female, is as old and revered as art itself. On the other hand, of course, people have always been appreciating their fellow humans for their characters. Both are completely natural and healthy parts of human existence. Beauty pageants are simply institutionalization of the natural human inclination to enjoy the physical beauty of the human form. Would Thatcher have us deny our very humanity? I should hope not.

Misplaced scribbling

This letter is addressed to the people who have been writing in the margins of the books they borrow from the University libraries: Stop it! For the past few weeks, I have been doing research for a major term paper. When I borrow a book, I do so out of an interest in what the author has to say, not what you have to say. It is very distracting to read your reactions to every idea that is presented before I get a chance to think things through for myself. Please do all of us a favor: put your ideas in a research paper or essay, where they will be appreciated, and leave them out of our books.

Random Notes

UMass must handle its affairs competently

Last week, while enjoying the Thanksgiving holiday with our family and friends, countless UMass students were greeted by a letter from the Parking Office calculating late fees for payment on tickets not received within the specified 21-day period. (Thanks for the warm holiday greeting!) In my case, these late fees are for tickets received in the spring semester of 1984 which, although admittedly paid late, payment was remitted over five months ago. The violation notice is dated November 14, post-dated November 19, and received by most students on November 21. The notice warned students that payment in full must be received no later than 8 a.m. on November 27 for no further legal action to result.

The final paragraph of the violation notice reads in big, bold, red print: "Failure to comply will result in additional penalties added to each violation(s) and automatic notification being sent to the Registry of Motor Vehicles for the purpose of non-renewal of your license or registration and may result in towing or immobilization of the vehicle at the expense of the registered owner."

Not only do I find the language of this letter completely repugnant but it seems paradoxical that the additional monies calculated are late fees when the Parking Office itself is over five months late in issuing this so-called late violation notice. The Parking Office had five months in which to issue such notices to students but, instead, chose to issue them to their homes during a holiday period and provided them with but one business day to settle this matter. This is absolutely unexcusable and unjustifiable.

When confronting the hearing officer with this issue, her gracious sympathies and apologies were expressed, but the Parking Office is buried in never-ending paperwork and thus cannot conduct its affairs adequately and promptly. Does this seem paradoxical to some? Look no further. This University is filled with such rhetoric and administrative incompetence.

I would like to conclude by addressing the Parking Office and the countless others who have displayed like incompetence. In addition to raising additional revenues at the students' expense, it has been expressed to me by various administrators that the psychology of late fees is punishment-oriented, in training students to handle their affairs in a competent, mature, and punctual manner. In so doing, you are establishing the norms, setting the guidelines and standards, and determining right from wrong. Encouraging students to pay fines within the specified period of time is commendable so long as the Parking Office is prompt in their affairs as well. Your teachings are valued and valid so long as you adhere to them yourselves. Do not expect students to subscribe to your set of rules if you do not exemplify them. The Parking Office displayed a greater lack of punctuality and incompetency than the students to whom they are issuing such notices. Consequently, their psychology is indeed paradoxical. Either practice what you preach, or do not bother preaching!

Naughty or nice?

Elizabeth Luciano

I handed one of the college-aged elves a buck-fifty so I could have my picture taken with Santa. She looked around and behind me.

"Where's the child?" she asked, the sleigh bells on her ballet slippers jingling.

"There is none. I'm the child," I said, less than a week shy of twenty-one. No matter. I perched on jolly old Saint Nick's knee. His "ho-ho-hos" became a little strained.

"Sorry, I haven't been working out lately," I said.

"No joke," he said.

"You're no Jack Sprat, yourself,"I replied.

"I can't help it," he said. "The kids leave all those cookies out for me every Christmas Eve, and I jut can't resist." Then he changed the subject.

"What would you like to find under the tree this year?" he asked.

"A date for drinks with Doug Flutie," I answered promptly.

"He's taken," Santa said.

"Bummer. How about a compact disc player, a car, or a meaningful relationship?"

"In what order?"

"That depends on whom the meaningful relationship is with," I said.

"Santa will try, but he can't make any promises," he said. I hate people who talk about themselves in the third person. It's so damned condescending. "The elves have been having a hell of a time getting those new-fangled stereos together. It's almost as bad as that video-games thing, a couple of years ago. And speaking of bad, how's your conduct been this year?"

"Fine." I replied quickly. Santa raised an eyebrow. "Well, I've been reasonably well-behaved," I said.

"Remember, I can see you when you're sleeping and I know when you're awake," he warned.

"Guess you didn't approve of my choice of teddy bears, huh?" I said.

"You've also made quite a few enemies this year," he reminded me.

"Yeah. That's true," I admitted. "A lot of people don't like what they call my 'radical feminist viewpoints.' Like a man I know who has a 'Girl Wanted' sign in his bedroom."

Santa coughed.

"Don't worry about that," he said, "he's on my bad list, anyway."

"About that car. . ." I hinted, not one to be sidetracked in automotive matters.

"Actually, I could do something about that. . ." Santa said thoughtfully. "Would you be interested in a previously owned vehicle? It's got a lot of mileage on it, but it's very reliable," he said.

"Sure, what is it?" I asked, expecting him to say 'A Chrysler,' or 'A Datsun.'"

"My old sleigh," Santa said. "The Mrs. and I have decided to buy a Thunderbird."

Leave if you don't like the entertainment

I just find it pretty sad when these people get all worked up over a couple of jokes. Don't we have better things to do here—like trying to be real students?

I certainly didn't feel as though I were being harassed, and I could venture a guess, that even the Black man who got up to dance at the last happy hour wasn't exactly feeling oppressed. I think he wouldn't have been so willing to dance on stage if he thought he were a victim of racism. While we're on the subject of harassment, by the way, I'm a little curious about that cartoon last week, depicting Cliff Myers in a Ku Klux Klan outfit. Doesn't the Board of Governors or the Collegian consider this a form of harassment, or do they have some 'inside scoop' on Myers being a member? Come on, now who's calling the kettle black?

You know, things get out of hand pretty fast around here. I'm talking about this Cliff Myers thing, of course. First, let's get one point straight: Myers never 'harassed' a Portugese woman. He pointed at me, a white, Irish-Catholic woman, when he made his joke. Now, I took it for what it was—a joke. That's all it was intended to be, but some people out there got all excited and started screaming racism and sexism.

Come on, guys. Most of us go to happy hours to kick back, have a few beers, and be entertained. I'd guess that most people, too, would simply leave if they didn't like the entertainment. The woman who started this whole mess was there for quite some time. In fact, I'd guess she stayed right up until the end, since that's when the 'harassment' of the Portugese woman happened. If she was really that disgusted with the show, why not leave? Why continue to subject herself to all this racism and sexism that was so insulting to her? She might have had a better day and saved a guy's job, too.

Well, it's over and done with now. Everyone's happy. The BOG and the 'ultra-liberals' are happy because they eliminated the menace, J.R.'s happy, because they've got Cliff Myers and his crowd, and the Blue Wall is . . . uh, well, sorry guys, but we had to prove a point you see, and uh, well. . .

The anatomy of tragedy

Roman Habtu

The world has recently been awakened to a human catastrophe that has claimed the lives of several hundred thousand people in Sub-Saharan Africa. In Ethiopia, 300,000 deaths from famine have been reported. The figure rises to 500,000 when Mozambique is included. Before the year is out, an additional million are expected to die from starvation in Ethiopia, and a total of six million are threatened. In Mozambique, the figure is four million. The problem: people do not have food to eat.

Ethiopia underwent a popular revolution which overthrew the late emperor Haile Selassie in 1974. A significant contribution to the emperor's downfall was his administration's political cover-up of the famine which claimed over 200,000 lives in 1973. A major gain of the revolution has been the land reform which dismantled the archaic land tenure system and redistributed land to peasants who had previously been subjected to offer their services and much of their produce to a small landlord class.

Under the emperor, Ethiopia was a staunch ally of the U.S. which trained and outfitted its army. However, the 1977 border war between Ethiopia and Somalia ended in one of the most classic turnaround events. The Soviet Union (formerly an ally of Somalia), came to the rescue of Ethiopia while the U.S. went to the side of Somalia. Since the switch in super-power alliance, Ethiopia has been stigmatized to the level of being the lowest development-aid recipient from the West.

Inside Ethiopia, the famine-sticken areas of the North have been the site of a war between liberation movements (Eritea, Tigrai) and the government. Needless to say, much of the country's resources have been spent on a war that is at a stalemate.

While the misallocation of insufficient resources is intensifying the famine, the root cause of the problem lies in Ethiopia's underdevelopment. Like much of the Third World, the people of Ethiopia do not have adequate health facilities, roads, water supply, irrigation systems and agricultural implements. Land reform has provided the basis for development but peasants cannot increase their food production without the necessary technical and material assistance. Ethiopia has adequate rainfall to allow multiple harvests annually, but this requires building dams that could save the water for irrigation. Under such circumstances, drought need not lead to famine. Furthermore, the current deforestation and erosion of the soil need not increase the potential for desertification if appropriate reforestation and soil conservation programs are introduced. However, such projects require financial assistance and a genuine commitment to development.

In this respect, a significant resolution to the crisis should entail a primary phase of sustained food aid delivery in order to prevent further massive death. It is imperative, however, that it be followed by a second phase of long term development planning involving national and international efforts. Otherwise, UN studies predict a yearly recurrence of famine with increasing death toll. If proper land use methods and irrigation schemes are made available, Ethiopia has the potential not only to feed itself but also become a net exporter of food.

This is the worst famine in Africa's history and the worst the world has seen this century. Two important lessons can be drawn. First of all, we cannot continue to see people as a liability. If supplied with the necessary tools to feed themselves, people not only become self-sufficient but also help nations grow. Secondly, people should not be held hostage to an East-West ideological confrontation to which they are oblivious. There is no jutification for the conspiracy of world politics at the expense of poor people. Neither is there room for tolerance in a world that can feed many times more than the current global population.

Dealing with people's destructive attitudes

Since I was sure that the issue of allowing Cliff Myers to perform on campus would die down quickly (I couldn't imagine anyone supporting such violent and degrading "humor"), I originally decided against writing a letter. I was afraid I would just be dragging the controversy on longer than necessary, and worse yet, boring the entire campus by hammering in the same opinion yet once more. Evidently, however, those who have been writing in to call for Myers' reinstatement are not worried about such things. So, my apologies for rehashing an old issue, but I thought it was about time another point of view was presented.

I would like to thank both the Collegian and the Board of Governors for the stand they took against violence against women. It seems that many people consider Myers' "humor" to be perhaps in questionable taste, but humor nonetheless, and completely harmless as such. What they fail to see is the connection between the attitude that women deserve to be raped (or that they somehow enjoy it), an acceptance of the presence of some kind of humor in this attitude, and the actual act of rape itself. They are not unrelated. We have seen four rapes reported on campus this semester, but, judging from the actions taken so far, one would think that the major cause is a lack of lighting and emergency phones in the appropriate places. Conditions like these certainly help to foster the actual crime, but the real problem is the attitude that O.K.'s and makes light of it, an attitude that Myers displayed in his "comedy" routine. Adding lights and phones is all very fine and good, but the violence will continue as long as it is a joking matter. That is why I would like to thank the Board of Governors and the Collegian for dealing with the real issue—the attitude— instead of the conditions.

Dishonest recruitment

In the November 27 Collegian, Carolyn Rosenbaum quotes Major Jay Bullington (recruiting officer for ROTC) as saying that "the military cannot and does not discriminate against women." I trust this was not what the Major said, since he knows as well as I do that the military does discriminate blatantly against women. Women are forbidden to go into combat, and therefore are unable to win the combat medals and rapid promotions that are available to males. Let's have a little truth in recruiting, shall we?

ARMY. BE ALL YOU CAN BE.

A political Spectrum ?

By JULIE BENNETT
Collegian Staff

Spectrum, the University's literary and fine arts magazine, is a slick, high quality production which showcases the talents of five college students.

Inside, there is everything from short stories and poetry to sculpture, paintings and photographs. "Winning and Losing" by Donald E. Benjamin, is a particularly well crafted story which captures the fear, pain, and shocking realizations nuclear war will inevitably bring, demostrating the folly of 'winning' a nuclear war.

One moving poem, "My Father's Purple Heart" by Myles Gordan chronicles the two basic but contrary forces symbolically represented within a war medal. Paintings such as "Evolution" by Libby Hubbard and "A Tree of Life" by Eve Christoph are especially eye-catching due to their busy yet readable scenes and particularly well developed color schemes. Also, photographs from Nice, France by Stephen Thomas and from Pune by Linda Lee Hodgdon convey romantic aesthetics and colorful reality.

As much as I enjoyed Spectrum for its craftmanship, it seemed to nurture a one-sided view which is best expressed in a statement by painter Leonel Gongora, in a Spectrum interview by Charles Francis Carroll. "Everything is political....even decorative art," Gongora said. All the pieces published in this year's magazine revolve around politics. The pieces are of politics' different facets and various manifestations, but the question is, does this truly represent the University as a whole or is it biased? Many people feel it is appropriate that there be a magazine, or part of a magazine, which represents these views, but that it is inappropriate that the literary and arts magazine of this University be exclusively political. Pamela Loring, Spectrum's poetry editor, feels that some people did not submit this year because they dislike the political bent of the magazine. She feels that "any kind of art is political, but art is art first." Art editor Libby Hubbard on the other hand, feels that the magazine's political aspect is necessary to generate a "Spirit of world peace."

Copies of this year's Spectrum are available in the University's galleries free of charge

An important Collegian Staff meeting will be held in the Newsroom tonight at 8 p.m. All staff and correspondents should attend.

Broad Street memoirs

Paul McCartney talks about the making of his new film Give My Regards to Broad Street

By CHRISTINE MARINI
Collegian Staff

Paul McCartney met recently with the college press in New York City to discuss his new 20th Century Fox release Give My Regards to Broad Street (playing this week at the Mountain Farms Cinema). The film, "a day in the mind of an international pop star," is McCartney's first feature film since Let It Be, made 14 years ago.

Give My Regards to Broad Street stars, besides McCartney himself, Linda McCartney, Bryan Brown, Ringo Starr, Barbara Bach, and Tracey Ullman. It also features the late Ralph Richardson in his last film role. Musicians in the film include members or former members of Led Zeppelin, Pink Floyd, 10cc, The Johnson Brothers and Toto.

McCartney wrote the screenplay for Broad Street, a musical thriller about what happens when the master tapes for a pop star's new album mysteriously disappear. The plot is interwoven with "flights of fantasy" and features fourteen songs, old and new, including some re-worked Beatles songs. The film was directed by Peter Webb and produced by Andros Epaminondas.

Give My Regards to Broad Street is a casually constructed film, stylistically inspired by underground films, according to McCartney. "The structure was there, and the script and casting were thought out," McCartney admitted, "but basically it's a big ad-lib."

"The director (Peter Webb) took off on images from the music," McCartney said. "It's sometimes surreal, like a dream."

The music is an important part of Broad Street, understandably, since it is a musical about the music industry. "The danger," McCartney admitted, "is making a musical movie into a music video. You can't separate the two—they cross over. People like me have been visualizing music on album covers for years, but with video you can really express it."

With songs like "Yesterday," "Eleanor Rigby," and "The Long and Winding Road" included in the Broad Street score, some critics have called the film, and its star, nostalgic. McCartney disagrees. "I don't need all that nostalgia. I'm just me. I realized that I hadn't sung some of these songs for 20 years. I was losing touch with these songs. But others I've never done, on stage or on film, with the Beatles. The director wanted to treat the musical part of Broad Street like a live concert, featuring not just fresh music."

As well as starring and performing musically in Broad Street, McCartney also wrote the screenplay—a first for him. He found the writing difficult but satisfying.

"When I was at school, English Lit. was my thing," McCartney said, "but I had a writer's block—I could never get past the style thing. Now, I just keep writing, even if it's bad, then go back and dot the i's. You can't be creative and judicial at the same time." His advice to writers is to "spew it spew it spew it!"

Paul McCartney answering questions

"I would do it again," he said. "I wouldn't be so frightened to do it as I was a few years ago."

There are advantages to working on both sides of camera, as well as to working with family and friends. "It's easier with friends," McCartney claimed. "It lubricates things a little if you know people in advance. You tend to share the same ideas."

The biggest influence in his life right now? "Definitely family life. It may be soppy," McCartney said good-humoredly,"but my thoughts are those of a father of four."

"The way I've felt about myself," he said, "is that I'm just a guy. When you become famous, it's other people's opinions of you that change. I'm from a very warm, working class family. That's the way it's always been. The rest is just surroundings."

McCartney's commitment to family and friends is reflected in what he sees as Broad Street's theme. "The movie's about trust," he said, smiling. "Watch it. If you like it, great. If you don't tough !"

"Making a movie is not much different from writing or performing a song," Paul McCartney stated as he mused over his Broad Street experience. "In both cases you create illusions. A song is an illusion. I'm just going into different fields to express that illusion."

McCartney on drugs

Paul McCartney discussed his controversial and outspoken stand on drugs, a topic that "always comes up" in his meetings with the press.

"I feel it's pretty crazy. I mean, it's 20 years after the sixties and we're still debating the merits of pot. I don't want to be set up as a preacher for pot," McCartney added. "If my kids came up to me and asked me what to do (about drinking and drugs) I'd say 'keep straight.' It's really the best way. But it's a crazy world when people grow up. I personally believe that, say, drinking three scotches is more dangerous than pot."

"People try to create scare stuff about pot," McCartney said. "But what about 'legal' drugs--Librium, Valium, barbituates? I mean, the glue you sniff may be legal--but it'll kill you."

"I don't think pot should be legalized, but decriminalized," McCartney said. "The danger is that they're driving kids toward alcoholism--kids go for the legal things."

George Thorogood draws blood

By JACK BRESNAHAN
Collegian Staff

There's a bright red splotch of blood on the front of my yellow John Lee Hooker T shirt which pretty much sums up the tone of this show. I'm quite certain I got it while being shoved back unexpectedly into the boards of the hockey rink/dance floor by a young woman. Violence, so much, rose out of Thorogood's songs about alcohol, sexual prowess, and bared emotion.

George Thorogood and The Destroyers played with a driving energy which rocked the crowd of 640C, and made a whole lot of them rowdy. Backstage, the first-aid room resembled a MASH unit, I think that this occurred because this music appeals to people's baser instincts. For example, I started the show off in a seat, but soon moved to the floor because I couldn't sit still. George came out like a caged lion, extremely upbeat. He did "House of Blue Lights," and a rocking instrumental, "Kids From Philly," featuring sax player Hank Carter. Following that was Bo Diddley's "Who Do You Love," at the end of which George exhorted the crowd to "STOP PUCHING AND SHOVING AND START KISSING AND LOVING." Getting loosy doosy, the natural-born barbeque and hootnany had begun.

"Wanted," was followed by Johnny Cash's "Cocaine Blues." Then came an updated "Bottom of The Sea," by Muddy Waters. "One Bourbon, One Scotch, One Beer," we found out just how lovey dovey the landlady was. But in the end he decides to "pack up my John Lee Hooker records and down the road I go." "Rock and Roll Christmas," which has MTV video, sounded a lot like Rock and Roll High School. As George explained to the woman bringing him his guitars, "First comes the rock, then comes the roll." This was followed by the slow going "Change My Style," and also "Can't Stop Loving," from the first album, tearing it up with the slide.

For Elmore James' The Sky Is Crying, George donned his familiar black hat, combining the lyrics with Jimi Hendrix's "Bleeding Heart." This was followed by another of Elmores', the very popular "Madison Blues." After leaving the stage briefly, they encored with "Bad To The Bone," (bbbbad) from their fourth consecutive gold album. Then these Delaware dogs did "Move It ON Over," definitely one of their most well known tunes. Before encore #2, George pointed out that this was his first time playing at the Civic Center and that "it's the start of a long and beautiful relationship." They then plowed into "Ride on Josephine," and finished up with "It Wasn't Me," by Chuck Berry. During these last two, George was playing behind his neck, kicking out, and kissing his guitar, while bras and panties were thrown onto the stage.

This weekend marked the 11th year the band has been together. Their new album, currently titled Gear Jammer, will be out in late January on EMI/Rounder. This will be followed by another extensive tour. Speaking with George, I was amused by his unpretentiousness and charm. I'm sure some of these attributes rubbed off from our mutual surrogate uncle, John Lee Hooker.

Gymnasts down Cadets

Weil, others lead way for men's team

By WAYNE SCHOFIELD
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team opened their season on Saturday with a 255.40-252.85 win over Army.

UMass took the second and third spots in the all-around with freshman standout Robert Weil tallying a 51.95 and Joe DeMarco close behind with a 51.90 mark. The number one all-around spot was won by Army's Mike Smith with an impressive 52.55 score.

UMass gymnast Lew Wingert, who finished up the meet with a solid routine on the high bar, said "right from the start we beat them on their best event," the floor exercise. UM scored a 44.95 on the floor as DeMarco won the top spot with a 9.35 followed by Army's Smith and UMass' Peter Lucchini.

In the next event, the pommel horse, UMass scored a 39.75 and managed to stretch their lead as Army scored a 36.4. Army's Bruce Gorski won the pommel event with an 8.8 followed by UMass' Weil with an 8.5. Co-captain Ken Doughtery locked down the third spot with an 8.35.

In the vaulting Army took the top three spots and scored a 45.5. UMass scored a 43.5 and led by three points going into the fifth event.

The parallel bars pulled the Cadets to within 2.5 points of the Minutemen. With Army having two gymnasts tie for the top spot with 8.95's UMass needed some solid routines. Lucchini scored an 8.75 and DeMarco an 8.65 to take second and third respectively.

With a slim lead and three freshmen competing in their first ever collegiate meet in the high bar,tension was building.

Rick Rourke, Jay Ronayne and Weil were all in the final event.

Rourke, Ronayne and Weil scored 8.4, 8.6 and 8.65, respectively, to clinch the meet for the Minutemen.

"We were cleaner then we have been in the past," said Wingert after the Minutemen scored a 42.85 to 42.8 high bar victory.

The Minutemen are back in action this Wednesday night against the University of Lowell at 7 p.m. at Boyden.

The face of New England Patriots All-pro guard John Hannah tells the story yesterday as he watches his team lose to the St. Louis Cardinals, 33-10. The loss, coupled with the L.A. Raiders victory over Miami, gives the Raiders a two-game lead in the race with the Patriots for the last playoff spot.

Three years ago The Legend began

Three years ago I was a senior in high school visiting Boston to see a friend at his college and take in the Penn State at Boston College football game.

Having never been exposed to big-time college football I insisted we stay and watch the game despite the Nittany Lion's commanding lead.

In the fourth quarter, as the legend goes, Eagle coach Jack Bicknell looked down his bench to a 5-9 3/4 fourth-string quarterback and told him to get in there and give it a shot.

The rest is history and maybe someday my grandchildren will believe it when I retell the tale of how The Legend began.

The thing I want to know is who gave Iowa quarterback Chuck Long two first place votes? And why wasn't Brigham Young quarterback Robbie Bosco, who came in third invited to the ceremony instead of the fourth place Bernie Kosar? The Legend got almost 1,000 votes more than Keith "Who says I'm good, I do" Byars. The Ohio State running back's father is a minister. Of what church, the ministry of the Big Mouth? The kid's damn good, but how could anyone think he's better than Flutie? They didn't give it to Herschel Walker when he was a sophomore so they weren't about to give it to Byars. Be serious.

Flutie, even I'll admit, won almost all of BC's games by himself but the Eagles won't be forlorn without him. They have several solid quarterback prospects in Notre Dame transfer Duke St. Pierre, Bourne high school product Rorery Perryman and Syracuse transfer Steve Peach. The Eagles will also enjoy good recruiting in the wake of The Legend's departure. They play a big-time schedule, Bicknell is being quoted nationwide and they'll appear on national television on January first against Houston in the Cotton Bowl. High school players eat that stuff up.

The Cotton Bowl will be an unadulterated romp in Texas for the Eagles. The Southwest Conference is so run-oriented that the Cougars will be shell-shocked by Flutie's air attack.

ABRAHAM'S AMBLINGS: The UMass basketball team has looked fairly impressive in two season-opening victories, but the true test of how good the Minutemen will be comes this week when they face UConn in Storrs on Thursday and Hartford at Hartford on Saturday. The week after they take on both Northeastern and BU at "home" in the Springfield Civic Center.

Bobby Braun has looked sharp at forward with solid defense and good rebounding. He's contributed his points and played a lot of minutes. He trails Horace Neysmith in the national free throw air-ball competition, 2 to 1. UM was 11 of 21 from the line at UNH looked as bad as that statistic reads. Only Carl Smith and Donald Russell, among the starters, are pressure free throw shooters. But when Horace scores only five points and UM wins, it's a bonus. Let's see after the next two weeks.

BU coach Rick Taylor has resigned. The sounds you hear is the collected media crying. Well-liked he wasn't. URI advanced into the semi-finals of Division 1-AA championships.

Was-I-Right-Or-What-Department: The Patriots el foldo is two two games strong. I, being no fool, read the paper and studied yesterday. Happy Birthday Tony "The Lebanese Strongman" Betros.

Minutemen defeat New Hampshire

Smith, defense key 55-51 win

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

DURHAM, N.H.—New Hampshire basketball coach Gerry Friel could see it coming, and there was nothing he could do.

With 1:35 to go in the game between UNH and the University of Massachusetts on Saturday, the Minutemen held the ball and a slim 48-47 lead.

"I thought to myself that (UMass guard Carl) Smith better not burn us again," Friel said. "I jut wanted to keep the ball away from him."

But UMass knows who its man is in key situations and with 1:16 to go, Smith drove to the hoop and was rapped by Wildcat guard James Best. He hit this shot and the ensuing foul shot and it was left to the Minutement to hold on for a well-deserved 55-51 victory.

Smith, who beat UNH last season on a basket with a second left, said his shot, a one-hander as he fell out-of-bounds, was actually aided by the foul.

"When I started the drive I was looking for the layup," Smith said. "Then I was cut off and went up to shoot. He hit me as I shot and it went in clean."

UMass, 2-0 on the season, won the game with great defense, and despite some terrible foul shooting. Only Smith and senior co-captain Donald Russell, who connected on five of six free throws in the final four minutes, were solid from the line as UMass was 11-of-21 from the stripe.

Russell had a good day with 18 points, on six-of-ten shooting, mostly from the outside. Smith and forward Bobby Braun contributed 11 points with Horace Neysmith getting only five on two-of-ten shooting.

"A lot of people think that we can win only if Horace gets a lot of points," UM coach Ron Gerlufsen said. "But today we showed we didn't need him to score. Our defense gave us the chance to win this game and Donald and Carl looked good when it counted."

UMass' man-to-man pressure defense kept UNH at bay, forcing the Wildcats into 22-of49 shooting (44.9 percent). Rodney Johnson led UNH with 17 points.

UMass held a 25-23 lead at halftime thanks to Russell's nine points. The Minutemen went out to a 6-0 lead only to lose that advantage to the Wildcats and guards Johnson and Best, who shot well from the outside.

But the Minutemen's defense kept UNH off the scoreboard for the final 5:20 of the half and went from being down 23-19 to a two point halftime lead as Russell hit a foul shot, Braun canned a layup and Smith calmly hit two 15 foot jumpers, one with two seconds left in the half.

UMass never trailed after that as two quick inside shots by Neysmith and Braun gave them a 29-23 lead.

The Minutemen kept UNH in the game with their terrible foul shooting. On three occaisions, UMass missed one-and-ones. They were 10-of-19 in the half.

But in the pressure situations UMass came through. With 1:35 to go Smith missed the front end of a one-and-one with UM holding a one point lead. Neysmith managed to tip the rebound to Smith and the 5-10 guard hit his clincher from there.

Braun, who played a career-high 32 minutes of good basketball, said that, although more tired than he's ever been after a game, "I think I'm doing what I'm supposed to be doing. I'm playing defense, rebounding and getting my points. We all have a role and if we fill them like we can, we'll do well. It's just a matter of execution, and so far we're executing."

MINUTEMEN MUTTERINGS: Five former Fork Union (Va.) Military Academy players were in Saturday's game. UMass' Smith, Lorenzo Sutton and Tom Emerson and UNH's Steele and Todd Black. Smith and Black were roommates at the school. . .Former UM guard A.J. Wynder, who transferred to Fairfield after being stabbed two years ago, is starring for the Stags with a ten point average. . .The Minutemen's first early signee is 6-5 forward David Brown, a blue-chipper from Cardinal Gibbons high school in Baltimore. The school has yet to act on his application. The Minutemen are also after a 6-11 center from Baltimore's Dunbar H.S. So is half the Atlantic-10. Both Temple and St. Bonaventure have signed seven-foot centers so the need for a big man is paramount. UMass now leads the season series with UNH 57-27.

UMass (55) Russell 6-6-18, Smith 4-3-11, Braun 5-1-11, Carter 3-0-6, Neysmith 2-1-5, Young 2-0-4, Sutton 0-0-0, Emerson 0-0-0, Swan 0-0-0. Totals 22-49, 11-21-55.

UNH (51) Johnson 7-3-17, Steele 4-3-11, Best 4-0-8, Koegman 3-2-8, Black 3-0-6, Bridge 0-1-1, Johnston 0-0-0 Totals 21-49, 9-16-51.

Chris Clarke battles for first place in the 200 Butterfly in Saturday's action against the University of Lowell. Clarke finished in second, as teammate Craig Fuller set a new school record. The Minutemen easily defeated Lowell, 80-33 at Boyden Pool.

Men romp in opener

UM Swimmers capsize luckless Lowell, 80-33

By NANCY A. BUKAR
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's swim team coasted to an easy 80-33 victory over the University of Lowell with Craig Fuller, a new addition to the team, breaking the school record for the 200 butterfly.

UMass dominated the meet from the start, winning first, second and third place in the 400-yard individual medley. Out of the eleven events, UMass accomplished a 1, 2, 3 sweep in four of them.

"I'm pleased with the way we swam today. There are a few tiny things we've gotta work on, UM coach Russ Yarworth said after the meet.

After the 400 individual medley relay (which was won by Jim Jacobson, Tony Baker, tri-captain Mike Minutoli and Eric Schmidt in 3:15.87), UMass pulled a one-two in the 1000 freestlye with Jim Flannery (10:27.09) and Rick Bishop.

Then came the second of the team's sweeps in the 200 free with Paul McDonough (1:49.65) in first followed by tri-captain Paul McNeil and Brian Semle.

In the 50 free, Lowell managed their only first place win in a swim event when Dave Colacito edged out tri-captain Bill Feeney with a 23:26. Brian Semle placed third. The 200 individual medley had Mike Hoover easily placing first with a time of 2:03.67 and Chad Stalker following with a third place win for UMass.

The 200 butterfly the record-breaking event. Craig Fuller, a transfer from Iowa, broke the school record set by Chirs Clarke in 1983 with a time of 1:56.83. Clarke's time was 1:59.17. "He's the best in New England," Clarke said.

Yarworth, pleased with Fuller's performance, said, "He's got some things to work on with his stroke but it's about where we wanted him to start the season."

The 100 free and 200 backstroke both had first place finishes for UMass. In the 100, Paul McDonough won with a :54.64 with Jim Jacobson winning the 200 back with a time of 2:09.51.

UMass completed their final sweep in the 500 free. McNeil placed first with a 5:05.29 followed by Mark Waters and Minutoli. The 200 breaststroke had Fred Marius in first place with a 2:23.57 and Rob Sheppard in third.

The 400 free relay team of Mike Genocoupolous, Flannery, Hoover and Fuller blew away the competition with a 3:16.46. "It's a very good time," said Yarworth.

In the one and three meter diving events, Lowell's Matthew Carroll placed first with some complicated dives. keith Pisani placed second in the one meter and third in the three meter.

"I'm keying on the next two meets (Tufts and Springfield)" said Yarworth, "because they're going to be tough. We're getting the injuries out of the way now."

Women's hoop grabs first win to take third in tourney

Balanced attack too much for Boston U.

FAIRFIELD, Conn. — The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team won its first game of the season yesterday with a 59-53 victory over Boston University in the consolation game of the Warner Classic at Fairfield University.

UMass had 17 points from junior transfer Juanita Matthews, 11 points and nine rebounds from Karen Damminger and ten points each from Barbara Hebel and freshman Tara Lewis. Joann Dupuis added nine points in a good effort.

The Minutemen, 1-3, fell to Providence College 63-47 in the opening round on Saturday. Matthews and Karen Fitzgerland had 12 points in the game with Lewis and Hebel getting ten.

With Dupuis running the point, the Minutemen were able to hold their lead against the Terriers. UMass lost Fitzgerland with a deep elbow bruise early in the game, but played solid defense in her absence.

"It's nice to see us get together and get a win," UMass captain Jerrie Bernier said. "We had a letdown against Providence but we got our game together against BU."

UMass coach Barbara Stevens said after the BU game that "we learned we can't take anyone lightly. We didn't play well against Providence, but against BU we put out a total team effort.

Against BU, UMass took a 25-20 halftime lead and never trailed as Metthews dominated the game with great shooting. The 5-10 transfer from Middlesex Community College hit on three straight to combine with three Lewis hoops and spark an 18-6 UMass spurt that gave the Minutemen a 45-32 advantage.

"We didn't dwell on our mistakes against BU, which we did against Providence and Florida (who beat UMass 67-51 on Thursday)."

"The loss of Karen (Fitzgerald) put the pressure on our defense, but we came through it well," the coach said.

UMass plays at Amherst College against Holy Cross on Thursday.

A WORD FROM THE ARTIST
Because I was born and raised in New York, of Puerta Rican parents, I have always been exposed to twa rich and cantrasting cultures. The energy and drive af life in the city has cambined with the love af nature, the cultural histary and religious beliefs of the Puerta Rican people.
I became aware of the richness and beauty af Indian and Hispanic cultures thraugh the experience of serving in the Peace Corps and living with a Namadic Indian tribe in the deserts of Calumbia.
The quest for self braught me back to New York and finally ta Puerta Rica, where I try in my art ta blent this awareness with my love af Illustratian and my need ta tell staries.
I draw and paint an wood using aid and newtechniques—burning the blacks and deep browns directly inta the wood and drawing with calored pencils and tempera. Thraugh my paintings I bring together these varying influences, uniting them to help me "Illustrate Life" in a living, electric and ematianal way.

Funding in Jeopardy

The New World Theater's (formely Third World Theater) exsistence was placed in the "hands" of only five people last week. The Budgets Committee of the Student Government Association passed a motion that it will not fund Fine and Performing Art Groups for fiscal year 1985. Exceptions to this motion are the Union Program Council and literary magazines, Spectrum, Drum and NUMMO NEWS. Just to set the record straight: NUMMO NEWS is a newspaper not a magazine! An argument given in support of this motion is that Fine and Performing Art Groups should be funded through the Arts Council since they recieve $10.00 from each undergraduate student. If the time had been taken by, Mr. Stair the maker of the motion and Mr. Rosner who seconded the motion along with anyone who voted in favor of it, to investigate whether or not the Arts Council had the lee-way in their budget to fund these groups they would have never endorsed such a ridiculous motion. First of all, almost every organization or group on this campus must go to more than one source of funding in order to obtain enough monies to put on a function, in fact the members of the Budgets Committee are the first ones to tell the organizations to go to other sources of funding,nice of them now to want to cut New World Theater and others for doing exaclty that! New World Theater is only one of the Third World organizations on this campus which has a proven track record of success, in working against such external barriers as finacial constraints and racism. Speaking of racism, there is a potential for the approved motion not to fund these groups as one in a recent series of actions to eliminate Third World organizations. New World Theater organization will no longer be a direct student activity without funding from the Student Government Association. A supporter of the motion said, it cannot be interpreted to be against the Third World community at all and he would like to see someone give solid arguments in proving this is a racist action. The proof is evident. If funding is cut countless numbers of Third World actors, directors, playwrights, producers and production people will be denied an invaluable opportunity to put thier talent to use. This is RACISM. Besides, the burden of proof is not, or should not be, placed on the victims. I challenge the supporters of this motion to prove that it is NOT racist.

Students may pay meal tax

Union asks for status change

By JOHN YONCE
Collegian Staff

If a lobbying effort by the non-professional employees' union at the University of Massachusetts is successful, students may have to start paying taxes of voluntary meal purchases at the Campus Center food services and other food establishments on campus.

"We're trying to correct an anomoly in the tax exempt laws," said Jonathan Tuttle, president of the local #1776 American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees.

UMass students are currently exempt from paying the state 5 percent meal tax on voluntary meal purchases on the UMass campus (like the Top of the Campus restaurant or Hatch Cafeteria) as well as the dining commons meal plans.

At the request of his union, Tuttle said he sent letters to state Sen. John Olver (D-Amherst) and Rep. Jim Collins (D-Amherst) requesting they introduce legislation that would exempt everyone at the institution or allowing the tax exempt status only at dining commons.

Tuttle said that problems arise when cashiers are harrassed by students when they ask for student identification.

Tuttle mentiond a letter to the editor of the Collegian last semester from a student who witnessed another student telling a cashier he hoped that "she would drop dead in four days" for charging two cents tax on a cup of coffee when he didn't show a student ID.

"This has been an issue ever since the ruling was made," Tuttle said. "We've tried administrative vehicles, the human relations service and the Collegian, but it doesn't get resolved," he said.

"People as grossly underpaid as cashiers shouldn't be subject to the effects of an unfair law," he said. He noted that many cashiers are also students.

Olver's legislative aide, Rob Warner, said they received a letter from Tuttle asking Olver to resolve the situation, perhaps legislatively, and advising that he "may wish to check with his student constituents." Warner said that the deadline for filing legislation is tomorrow and that Olver would probably not introduce legislation this session.

Micki Beales, a Collin's aide, said Collins received a copy of the letter sent to Olver, but it wasn't likely that Collins would introduce legislation this session either. Collins was not available for comment.

"Both (Collins and Olver) were surprised at the interpretation of the bill," Tuttle said. "I'm sure this is not what they intended."

"(This bill) offers an unfair advantage," he said, "The TOC can offer what amounts to a discount."

"We aggressively support the notion of an exemption for the entire institution," Tuttle said. "We don't want to alienate the students -the expense of the institution over four years is enough without paying meal tax."

Students close to grievance policy

By BOB BURGESS
Collegian Staff

Last week was a successful one for the Student Government Association's Academic Affairs committee.

The committee, which works with University of Massachusetts' administrators and faculty for student academic rights, saw its "Desired Patterns of Course Conduct" passed Wednesday by the Faculty Senate's Academic Matters board. And according to committee chairwoman Gayle Witjen, this approval is the last step toward Academic Affairs' main goal this school year--a student academic grievance procedure.

Although Academic Matters only recommends educational issues to the Faculty Senate, Wintjen said Thursday she expects the "desired patterns to pass in the Faculty Senate."

The five patterns approved form a guideline for instructor responsibilities. They include semesterly updates of course syllabus, increased attention to consistent grading techniques, and reminders to students of examination times and where they will be held. One course recommendation is that an instructor not give any tests which are unannounced at the course's outset.

Wintjen said that these guidelines represent the first attempt by students and faculty to agree on an instructor's conduct, and should lead to an academic grievance policy.

"I've heard of at least one example of a professor announcing a final exam during the last week of classes, when he had told the class there would not be one," Wintjen said. "And when students object (to such behavior by an instructor), who can they turn to?

"I hope we will have academic procedures for students to recover from something like this," Wintjen said.

SGA co-president Rick Patrick, who is a member of the Academic Matters committee with Wintjen, said yesterday, "At a university of this size, certain student rights will be denied. There is always a small percentage of instructors who change their course structure after it begins, and unless checks are made, students are at the mercy of these professors."

Academic Affairs also worked to put a motion on this week's Undergraduate Student Senate's agenda calling for "immediate negotiations" between senators and administrators to redesign the University's present swing space policy.

Swing space is emergency housing for students who are not assigned dormitory rooms at the beginning of a semester.

Wintjen, and the motion's sponsor Stacy Roth, said a feasibility study for more space is necessary because areas used for swing space take away from study areas on campus.

Jewish women struggled with fascism

By REBECCA THATCHER

SOUTH HADLEY—Jewish women living in Germany between the wars were oppressed by a Nazi regime which was not only anti-semitic but also misogynist (woman hating), according to a speaker at Mount Holyoke College yesterday.

Marion Kaplan, the associate director of the Leo Baeck Institute in New York City, which researches the history of German Jews, gave a lecture titled, "Sisterhood Under Siege, the German and Jewish Women's Movements Between the Wars."

"In a period of crisis, racial identity prevailed over female solidarity, not only among Jews where it was imposed, but also among German gentile women who accepted and embraced racist divisions," Kaplan said.

She said German Jewish women organized around both women's issues and around Jewish issues during the depression. But as the Third Reich came to power they found themselves forced to abandon some of their feminist work in order to survive.

"The misogyny of the Third Reich made feminism impossible and dangerous," she said.

Kaplan said the history of the German Jewish women "forces us to acknowledge the salience of race in the struggle for equality."

Before Hitler came to power, Jewish feminists had formed The League of Jewish Women which included 20 percent of the Jewish women in Germany and worked towards equality for women, career training and against the forced abduction of women into prostitution.

"They engaged in traditional liberal strategies to acquire political power. Simultaneously, the (organization) developed its own alternative to male power by building an organization of women, for women, she said.

"They endured discrimination in Germany as women and they endured sexism in the Jewish community," she said.

Tribe may claim land

BOSTON (AP) — A proposal that would allow the Wampanoag Indians to reclaim some of their tribal lands in the Town of Gay Head on Martha's Vineyard has been edorsed by the Massachusetts Senate.

The lawmakers approved a bill yesterday that would show the state's support for the settlement, which calls for the town to give the tribe control of 238 acres--including prime beachfront and cliff sites in the resort community.

Court to rule on sewer moratorium

BOSTON (AP) - The state Supreme Court agreed yesterday to hear a request that it cancel a judge's order halting sewer connections in Boston and its suburbs in an effort to speed clean-up of Boston Harbor.

A hearing was scheduled tomorrow before Justice Joseph Nolan on the appeal filed by the state attorney general's office.

"Any harm resulting from new sewer connections is negligible compared to the massive injury to the regional social and economic interests caused by a halt to virtually all development," the appeal said of Superior Court Judge Paul Garrity's order.

Garrity's ruling Thursday in Middlesex Superior Court in Cambridge came in an ongoing court battle initiated by the southern suburb of Quincy, which filed suit against the Metropolitan District Commission and state officials over Boston Harbor pollution.

The MDC sells sewer service to 43 Massachusetts communities. Its treatment plants are estimated to release billions of gallons of raw or partially treated sewage into the harbor, fouling Quincy beaches and clam flats.

Garrity had appointed a special master to study the issues, then agreed to delay action until the Legislature came up with an alternative. But the House last Wednesday postponed action on a bill to create a new sewer authority, and Garrity ordered the moratorium. His ruling would affect sewer connections and extensions granted since June 13, 1983, when the suit was filed.

Garrity also scheduled a hearing for Suffolk Superior Court in Boston today to consider placing the MDC's sewer division in receivership.

Liberal arts in college not dead, panel says

BOSTON (AP) — Liberal arts colleges and their graduates can succeed if they don't forsake the traditional lessons of philosophy and language for classes in metal working or sheep sciences, a panel of college presidents said yesterday.

"Colleges which have maintained and strengthened the quality and coherence of their liberal arts programs are thriving," said Arthur Levine, president of the 180-year-old Bradford College and one of six college presidents drafted by the Ford Foundation to study the decline of liberal arts education.

Levine's comments came at the end of a weekend conference that saw some 25 educators and corporate executives offer their views on the future of liberal arts education to the six-member panel.

India gas leak kills at least 410

NEW DELHI, India (AP) — Deadly gas leaking from a pesticide plant spread over a sleeping city in central India early yesterday, killing at least 410 people and injuring thousands.

Thousands of people frothing at the mouth, rubbing swollen eyes and gasping for breath jammed hospitals in Bhopal. Doctors set up tents on hospital lawns to treat victims.

Witnesses said bodies were stacked outside morgues, and the carcasses of water buffalo and other animals lay in the streets where they were felled by the gas.

Arjun Singh, chief minister of Madhya Pradesh state, told reporters the gas escaped from one of the three underground tanks at the Union Carbide plant in Bhopal, 370 miles south of New Delhi.

He said 402 people died in Bhopal. Five were killed in Hoshangabad, two in Sehore and one in Ashta, he said. The three places are located near Bhopal.

The United News of India put the death toll at 500, but the figure could not be confirmed independently.

Singh said five officials of the plant had been arrested. He said the 40-minute leak began about 1 a.m.

He told reporters that 2,000 people were hospitalized and 8,000 received medical attention and were sent home.

Thomas Sprick, spokesman for the U.S.-based Union Carbide Corp. in Danbury, Conn., said the gas that leaked was methyl isocyanate, which he said can be fatal if inhaled or swallowed.

Supreme Court will decide on school reimbursements

WASHINGTON (AP) — The U.S. Supreme Court agreed yesterday to decide whether public school officials must reimburse private school costs for parents who decide on their own to transfer their handicapped child from public school.

The court will study an appeal by officials from Burlington, Mass., challenging a ruling in favor of the parents of Michael Panico, who has a reading diability.

In 1979, the Panicas transferred Michael, then eight, from public school to the Carroll School, a private school in Lincoln, Mass.

The Panicos said the school was better equipped to help Michael overcome his disability.

Burlington school officials that year had planned to enroll Michael in a special education classroom in the Pine Glen public school.

Rape-murder witnesses sought

NEW YORK (AP)—A police squad canvassed an Upper West Side block Monday in search of witnesses to the stabbing of a young drama student who was killed as she fought off a would-be rapist and robber.

Working on only a sparse description from the victim before she died, more than 15 police officers and detectives interviewed neighbors who said they heard the woman screaming early Sunday but were unable to help her.

At St. Luke's Hospital, where Caroline Isenberg died on the operating table, she told a worker, "Maybe I should have given in. Maybe I should have given the money up," said Richard Dillon, chief of detectives in Manhattan.

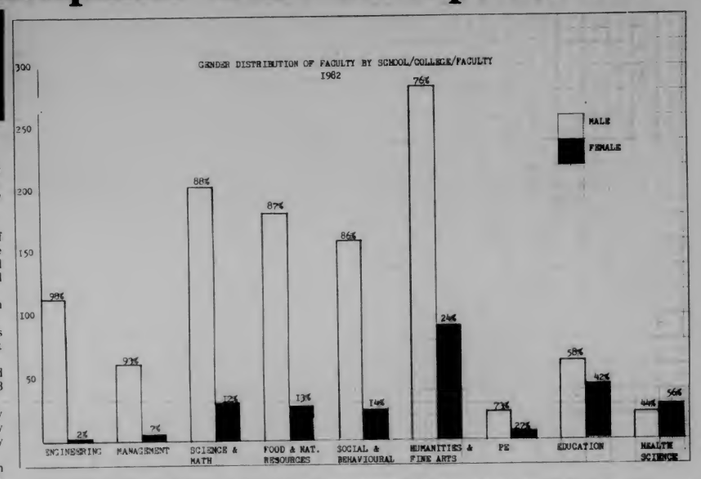
'Prestigious disciplines' lack women professors

WOMEN IN FACULTY

By DEBORAH ROSS
Collegian Staff

Editor's note: This story is the second in a five part series that examines the status of women faculty at UMass. Yesterday's story examined the role of the hiring procedure in promoting discrimination.



Women faculty members at the University of Massachusetts are not equally distributed throughout the departments on campus, and tend to be least represented in the disciplines that are best paid and that are considered the most prestigious, traditionally male domains.

The 1982 figures for the Office of Affirmative Action show:

The engineering department has 117 faculty members and only two of these positions are filled by women. That is, 98 percent of the engineering faculty are male.

The School of Management has 70 faculty members and only five of these positions are filled by women. That is, 93 percent of the management faculty are male.

The School of Natural Science and Math has 249 faculty members and only 30 of these positions are filled by women. That is 88 percent of the science and math faculty are male.

History professor Joyce Berkman comments that "women are still in those areas they have always been"; in such departments as education, 46 percent female, and in health science, where 56 percent of the faculty are women.

Anthropology Professor Sylvia Forman advises that "caution" is needed when considering these statistics because "one can only reasonably look for discrimination if there are an equal number of male and female candidates" when vacancies arise in the departments where women are under-represented.

According to Forman "the problem starts out long before" because of the small pool of women candidates available for faculty positions in some departments.

For vacancies in engineering "there are just so few women candidates" said Richard Giglio, head of the Department of Industrial Engineering.

Giglio recalls that for one vacancy in industrial engineering only one woman applied among 100 applicants. "We offered her the job, but she went into industry," he said. Giglio suggested that the problems of recruiting women are intensified because of competition "from companies that are also interested in fulfilling their affirmative action obligations."

Giglio said a possible solution is to encourage women in engineering to pursue doctorates and thus enlarge the pool of future female candidates for faculty positions.

But he recognizes that this is a "catch 22" situation; until there are more women faculty, women students will fail to aspire to faculty positions.

Education Professor Barbara Love believes that women studying in departments with predominantly male faculties "have fewer role models, fewer mentors, fewer people to talk to and fewer people to talk up for them."

She likened graduate education to an "initiation process" whereby current faculty members look at graduate students as potential future faculty members and ask the question "can you be like one of us?"

She suggested that the answer is less likely to be "yes" if the current faculty is male dominated and the graduate student in question is a woman. As such, Love contends that women will not be encouraged in their studies to the same extent men are.

According to English Professor Arlyn Diamond, the lack of women in certain faculties is "not unique to UMass but reflects what is true on a national basis." But Diamond questioned whether the lack of women at UMass really reflects problems of availability especially "in the humanities where there are plenty of available candidates."

James Boylan, journalism professor and head of the Massachusetts Society of Professors, is "impatient" with the 'so few women candidates' arguments because, he said, if departments were really serious in their efforts to recruit women they would "go out and explore the field and not just wait for women to apply."

Tomorrow's story will focus on the issues of retention and tenure of women faculty at UMass.

Training workshop on civil disobedience

A workshop to train people in civil disobedience for a demonstration at the Westover Air Force Base in Westfield will be held tonight in the Campus Center room 174 at 7:30 p.m.

The protest at Westover, to protest President Reagan's militarism, nuclear policy and Nicaraguan policy, will be held on Sunday Dec. 9, according to local civil disobedience (CD) organizer Erie Walgren of Belchertown.

"Popular CD is pressure that politicians respect," Walgren said. "They learn we are serious. And that we are broad based Vietnam acivists combined with progressive students."

"We are negotiating with the police for cooperative no-force arrests," he said. "Our symbolic obstruction is a media message to military planners, not local police."

Only people that have participated in the training sessions can be involved in the civil disobedience. Those who go to the training session are not committed to CD, Walgren said.

The CD people will sing songs, carry banners, not destroy the base property and train for passive resistance when arrested by police, a flyer on CD distributed by Walgren stated.

Professor illustrates shape of things to come

By DANIEL WHITE
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts professor is working on finding the equation to describe a new shape recently discovered by a professor at the University of Toledo.

The unnamed shape was discovered by Prof. Henry Wente of Toledo, who had been working on it for five years.

Professor David Hoffman believed that only a sphere of the UMass math department said that while the shape has no practical applications at the present, it may in the future.

What makes this shape special, Hoffman said, is that it "tries to minimize area subject to enclosing a fixed volume." Hoffman likened it to a soap bubble which, while enclosing a fixed volume, will try to minimize the amount of its surface area exposed to the air. Before now, it was had this property.

While no one as yet has seen this new surface, Hoffman said it should look something like a "doughnut with an irregular surface," or "necklace of clam shells."

Hoffman said he hopes, with the aid of computer graphics, to get a picture of the surface, and from this, its equation. As yet only the parameters of the surface are known. He said that it could take months of computing time to accomplish this.

Wente discovered the new surface while working on an alternate solution to Hopf's Conjecture. This states that a sphere is the only surface whose curvature is the same at any two points. This property is called constant mean curvature.

He began with a torus (similar to a bloated doughnut) and distorted it until he came up with a new surface with a constant mean curvature.

Student arrested on assault charge

A 19-year-old UMass student was arrested Saturday night and charged with breaking and entering in the nighttime and indecent assault and battery on a person over 14 years old, University of Massachusetts police said.

Police said the indecent assault and battery was reported at 2:41 p.m. Saturday and the arrest was made later that night. Police said there will be no more information given until the Sensitive Crimes Unit completes the investigation.

Police passing by the woods near Sylvan Residential Area at 4 p.m. Saturday observed several people building an 8 foot by 8 foot paneled underground room, police said.

The group was told to stop digging and police said they will be billed for whatever damage they caused.

A 19-year-old UMass student was arrested at 1:57 a.m. Sunday while walking on Fearing Street and charged with the theft of a Christmas tree and using false information in obtaining a driver's license.

A 17-year-old Malden man was arrested near the Southwest Residential Area horseshoe at 2:15 a.m. Sunday and charged with the theft of a parking sign and its post, both valued at more than $100.

An 18-year-old UMass student was arrested at 12:06 a.m. Saturday and charged with being a disorderly person, when police observed the man running out in the middle of Massachusetts Avenue near Haigis Mall.

An 18-year-old UMass student was arrested while driving on Stadium Road at 12:03 a.m. Sunday and charged with having no license, impeded operation because he exceeded the capacity of his car and transporting alcohol while being a minor.

Two 19-year-old female UMass students were arrested in Washington dormitory at 8:47 p.m. Saturday and charged with being minors in possession of alcohol.

A 21-year-old UMass student was arrested when he was stopped on Stadium Road and charged with the theft of the Chevrolet pickup truck he was driving as well as driving while intoxicated, police said.

Police said they arrested the Brittany Manor resident at 3:37 a.m. Saturday.

Police said an AM/FM cassette stereo, valued at $250 was stolen from an unlocked room in John Adams dormitory.

The elevators in Washington Dormitory were loaded with more than 20 pieces of lounge furniture causing damage to one elevator, police reported.

Police said the furniture came from several lounges in the dormitory and the incident was reported at 7:31 a.m. Saturday.

IUD can be legitimate birth control device, says UHS

As the A.H. Robins Company spends millions of dollars on a campaign to have the Dalkon Shield, an intrauterine birth control device (IUD), withdrawn from the market, local medical authorities say that other types o. IUDs are legitimate methods to prevent pregnancy.

The IUD is a plastic contraceptive device inserted into the uterus with a string hanging down into the cervix. The IUD stimulates an immunilogical response that makes the uterus an unfavorable site for implantation.

According to the Contraception Information Series distributed by the University of Massachusetts Health Services (UHS), the IUD offers about 96 percent level of protection against pregnancy, though it does increase the risks of infection of the uterus, fallopian tubes, and ovaries.

The IUD is not as dangerous in women who have already had children, older women, and those women with stable partners. It is more dangerous in women who have not had children and younger women, according to Terri Dean, head of medical services at the Family Planning Council of Western Massachusetts.

With these considerations, "Women should be given a choice," Dean said. The IUD should be an option for all women, even those who have not had children, she said.

Cathy Foley, nurse practitioner from Cambridge Women's Health Care Associates, said women should be "well-educated and know all the pros and cons about any method of birth control before choosing."

Foley agreed with Dean's consideration, and said that as long as women understand the risks of the IUD it is an option.

The IUD also can create a heavier period during the menstrual cycle, increase menstrual cramps, and increase the risk of anemia, Dean said. The Contraception Information Series warns that "insertion of the IUD may also be painful."

Contraception Education Programs are given four times a week each semester at UHS as well as outreach workshops, reaching about 1,500 people a year, according to Pam Gonyer, contraception programming coordinator at UHS.

Gonyer called the IUD "the invisible method" of birth control because "there is little user involvement." While the IUD has a high effectiveness rate, Gonyer said, "pelvic inflammatory disease is the largest concern."

The education program presents "the pros and cons of all forms of birth control. The purpose is neither to scare people to death or to promote one particular method," Gonyer said.

According to Dean, three percent of the Family Planning Council's 14,592 clients in 1983 use the IUD.

Pelvic disease risk increased by intrauterine devices, multiple sex partners, says doctors

While medical authorities caution women against the inherent risks involved in using the Intrauterine Device (IUD) as a form of birth control, they warn that multiple sexual partners also create risks of infection.

"PID (Pelvic Inylammatory Disease) is most often related to the IUD, but, in actuality, PID comes from sexually transmitted diseases," Terri Dean, head of medical services at the Family Planning Council of Western Massachusetts, said.

"PID is directly correlated with a person's sexual attitude," Dr. Daniel Clapp of the University of Massachusetts Health Services (UHS) said. Clapp inserts IUD's for women in the area requesting them. Clapp said he inserts one or two IUD's each week.

Clapp said he has seen some cases of patients with PID, and said they were not exclusive to those women using the IUD.

"While the IUD increases the risk twofold, multiple sexual partners increase the risk fourfold," Clapp said.

Clapp cautioned against the use of one intrauterine device, the Dalkon Shield, withdrawn from the market in 1974 by the A.H. Robins Company. In April 1983 the National Women's Health Network through the Food and Drug Administration, issued a warning to all women still using the Shield to have it removed due to the number of infections and spontaneous abortions associated with it.

Germs and bacteria get into the body through the woven multiple-filament thread in the Dalkon Shield, more readily than in the more common single-filament thread used in other IUD's, according to Clapp.

Not until October 1984 did the Robins' Company begin a campaign of television and newspaper advertisements to persuade women still using the Shield to have it removed.

Contraception device costs are not included in the regular student health fee, Clapp said, and people who go to the UHS may get any form at wholesale cost.

Sandinistas will misinform

Peter Dow

Lately many editorials in the national media have been written attempting to justify the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua. But in glorifying the Sandinistas, many stories blatantly ignore the fact that the Sandinista regime is one of Central America's most ruthless human rights violators.

Recently an obviously false statement was printed in the caption under a photograph in a newspaper of a Sandinista painting. The artwork depicted CIA riches flowing into the hands of the contras; the caption claimed that the contras were actually Somoza's National Guard. Not surprisingly, this type of Sandinista misinformation has been eagerly eaten up by the leftist American simpletons, who will believe anything that somehow justifies "the revolution." The intellectual sterility of the radical mentality is no more obvious than in this case; for if these ignorant and misguided utopians only investigated the facts (something easily accomplished), they would have discovered that the contras are actually the original democratic Sandinistas; the same ones who fought side by side with the Marxist Sandinistas in the fight to oust Somoza. The seven members in the directorate of the contra Nicaraguan Democratic Force (FDN) were all anti-Somoza, but now they are fighting the Sandinistas to force the Marxists into implementing the democratic principles and institutions which they promised in 1979. One member is Adolfo Calero, who was a long-time opponent of Somoza, and was jailed in September 1978 for his political activities. Another is Indalecio Rodriguez, who fought against Somoza in 1979. Alfonso Callejas served in Somoza's cabinet until 1972, when he resigned in protest over the lack of elections, and was forced to flee into Honduras. When Callejas returned in 1979, he saw the Marxist Sandinistas taking control of the country, so he joined the FDN. Another contra force, located in southern Nicaragua, is ARDE (the Democratic Revolutionary Alliance), led by Eden Pastora and Alfonso Robelo. Both Pastora and Robelo fought Somoza's National Guard, and Pastora (the famed "Commander Zero") was even labeled a Sandinista hero for his fight against Somoza.
